

IDENTITY REACHES ITS CENTURY

News

Postal Ballots 'Open to Fraud'

The nation's 'sleaze watchdog', Sir Christopher Kelly, chairman of the Committee on Standards in Public Life, last month repeated the warning that the voting system has become more vulnerable to fraud since the introduction of postal ballots on demand. Importantly, he claimed that Labour is unwilling to introduce tougher checks because it is concerned that the move could lead to it losing the next election.

The government has completely ignored the recommendations by the Electoral Commission that England, Scotland and Wales move to a system of individual registration, as is the case already in Northern Ireland, where voters are required to supply a signature, date of birth and National Insurance number to be included on the electoral roll. Labour appears to be supporting voting fraud by even omitting to include this recommendation in the Political Parties and Elections Bill currently before Parliament. However, they are aiming to include a clause that will make it easier for people to get on to the electoral register at the very last moment before an election day. This will be yet another channel for electoral abuse.

British Jobs For British Workers

The Solidarity Trade Union has said that the 'Wildcats' strikers at the Lindsey Oil refinery and elsewhere are right: British Jobs for British Workers! Solidarity members joined British National Party members in offering support to the Wildcats at Lindsey.

It adds that NuLab and the bosses of the tame establishment Unions have made patronising statements saying they "understand the concerns" of ordinary workers. Yet in a time of recession and rising unemployment jobs are being shipped abroad and jobs here given to foreign or migrant workers.

In sharp contrast rank and file workers are quite clear about the issues and what must be done about them in the future after last month's betrayal by the internationalist Union bureaucrats.

Solidarity details:
www.solidaritytradeunion.org. PO Box 93, Spennymoor, DL16 9AN.

Bank Pulls Plug on Shipyard Jobs

Lloyds TSB, one of the banks that received billions of pounds of taxpayers' money, has refused to continue providing finance for a project in Teesside that would bring more than a 1,000 jobs to the North East.

According to the Northern Echo it also emerged that the Tees Alliance Group (TAG), which was awarded the £300m contract to build the oil and gas platform for global offshore company SeaDragon, is considering legal action to ensure the work remains in the North East. SeaDragon aims to move the work to Singapore.

And the Lib-Lab-Con says we cannot have "protectionism" but must remain globalist, like the banks who are supported by our money.

UK's Islamic Banks Bigger than Pakistan's

Britain's Islamic finance sector is now bigger than Pakistan's, says a study by International Financial Services London. The £12 billion in assets of Britain's Islamic banks dwarf those of some states where Islam is the main religion.

There are now five "fully Sharia-compliant banks in Britain and another 17 have set up branches or subsidiary firms for Muslim clients.

This reflects the rapid growth of Britain's Muslim population, which is said to have increased ten times faster than any other group in the past four years.

Labour Bans St.George's Day Parade

England's biggest St.George's Day parade is facing the axe after Labour Councillors in Sandwell, West Midlands, voted to withdraw financial support. The reason is that they say many of the 15,000 who now enjoy the parade through West Bromwich "were racist".

In a letter to the organisers (who need £10,000 to cover the parade costs including expensive insurance), Labour's Yvonne

Davies said the parade created an "unhealthy atmosphere and inspired young boys to be racist". She added: "It is not only the parade which is the problem, but the tribal excitement it creates".

Meanwhile, we are assured that there will be no restrictions on any St Patrick's Day, St.Andrew's Day or St. David's day parades or events and that the Notting Hill carnival this August will, of course, go ahead as usual. And our Muslim friends can still have their annual procession through High Wycombe in March to mark the birthday of the Prophet Muhammad.

Asian Gang's 'Racist Attack'

This extract of a report in Scotland's Daily Record of February 10, 2009, is considered as 'news' by Identity because just two years ago newspapers like this Labour-supporting paper would never even consider publishing a story which portrayed white people as the victims of racist violence. It was headed "Four People Injured as Snowball Fight Turns into 'Racist Attack'".

"Four young men were brutally attacked after a snowball fight exploded in racist violence.

"They were beaten by a weapon-wielding gang of Asian men who pounced on them from a car.

"The victims, who were all white, suffered broken bones and head wounds. Three of them were in a serious condition in hospital last night". "It's a miracle no-one died", said a bystander.

The Daily Record even reported that it was in the same Glasgow street, Kenmuir Street, where in 2004 "Kris Donald, 15, was repeatedly stabbed and set alight after being snatched". The Muslim names of the convicted torturers and murderers were then given.

identity

Editor: John Bean
Design: Mark Collett
March/April 2009

Public reference:
ISSN 1469-7971

Subscriptions Dept:
PO Box 17, Amlwch,
LL68 8AB

Tel: 0871 050 0238

subscriptions@bnp.org.uk
www.identitymagazine.org.uk

Articles should be submitted to the addresses below in

typed/electronic format:
PO Box 97, Newmarket,
Suffolk CB8 1WT.

Email: identity@bnp.org.uk

100 Issues Campaigning to Preserve Our Identity

This month we celebrate the publication of the 100th issue of Identity since it was launched, initially as a bi-monthly, in February 2000. The first editor was Paul Golding, who remained in the post for some two years with the difficult task of building up the circulation from scratch as well as increasing the number of good nationalist writers for the BNP's first magazine. Today, Paul is the BNP's 'super-activist'; he is the editor of the party's regular electronic newsletter BNP eNews, a regular election campaigner who last month won a council seat from Labour in Sevenoaks, as well as being the driver and general factotum of the BNP Truth Truck.

In that first issue Nick Griffin wrote: "The new, modernist nationalism to which the British National Party is now firmly committed is not about confrontation, about a little sect of 'true believers' preaching to the already converted, so confrontational or 'in-house' names that provide the reassuring comfort of a small-but-perfectly-formed political ghetto are out."

Nick added: "The preserving of the identity of the traditional inhabitants and cultures of Britain is, then, our primary purpose. Our demand to preserve that identity threatens no one; it raises no alarming or debatable questions of superiority or inferiority. The right to be ourselves in our own land is nothing more or less than a basic human right and a fundamental of Natural Law. So there can be no better name for the BNP's most important publication than Identity."

Having rejoined the BNP when Nick Griffin was elected Chairman in 1999, my enthusiasm to do something for the cause of nationalism was encouraged month by month at the progress being made. I was asked by Nick in late 2002 if I would take over the editorship, which he had been carrying out together with all the other work that his leadership entailed. This 100th issue marks my 70th issue as editor.

In 2003 Identity was no longer the only regular publication produced by the party. The Voice of Freedom, so ably edited by another long-term nationalist, Martin Wingfield, had now become established as a popular newspaper giving easy-to-digest comments on BNP policies, with numerous photographs of the men and women who make up its membership and accounts of branch activities ranging from meetings to local election campaigns. With a circulation, through branches and door-step sales, now approaching ten times that of Identity, Freedom, as it is now more popularly known, has played a major role in increasing the BNP average vote.

I could soon see that there was little point in Identity also covering the details of branch meetings and individual council by-election results and, for example, the individual outrageous actions of some of our immigrants, with space being at a premium particularly as this information was regularly appearing on the BNP's ever-improving website. The policy we did our best to follow was to inform and educate our readers, including new members won over by Freedom, on the basis of nationalism.

The Coming New Look

BNP membership today has increased more than six-fold since issue No.1 was published. Therefore, to pursue the policy of educating our new members and turning them into ideological nationalists, starting with issue No.101 Identity will have a greatly increased number of pages, with a new design, and published quarterly. Importantly, the circulation will be much larger as it will be available to all members as part of their membership subscription. It will still be available for non-membership supporters to buy. I shall be a member of the new look's editorial team (for which you can either groan or cheer).

A few months after I took over editorship in 2003, Mark Collett took over the design and layout which has given this magazine its distinct and professional style. It has been a two-way street, with both of us contributing to its overall appearance. Mark, who is also the party's Publicity Director, will, of course, be involved in the new look Identity. We have both come to the conclusion that in this age of decreasing in-depth reading, we need to publish more shorter articles of up to 1200 words in length. This is born out by the fact that readers' comments have shown that their favourite sections appear to be "Nationalist Notebook", "Speakers' Corner" and the News page.

Our thanks go to our many contributors over the past nine years. To name but a few, Lee Barnes, with his quill dipped in venom; John Maddox, who has shown why practicing Christians can vote BNP; Tim Heydon, who has destroyed the lie of cultural relativism; and Tony Holroyd who has given us several well thought out articles on alternative energy sources.

Finally, two years and four months ago did anybody read in the mainstream media a prediction that the then 'worrying' credit problem was about to explode into a world-wide economic crisis? It only appeared in our December 2007 issue in an article, The Crisis of Globalism, by Nick Griffin. How's this for a prescient comment:

"The global financial system is in the throws of a massive heart attack which will end not just in the destruction of trillions of dollars of junk paper wealth, but also with the death of the post-war hegemony of the Dollar, the collapse of the debt-financed consumer booms that have covered up the deindustrialisation of the USA and Britain."

John Bean

A BNP Breakthrough - Hype & Reality

» As Labour MPs queue up to hype the BNP's chances of a Euro-breakthrough, Nick Griffin examines the reality behind the hysteria.

What are Labour playing at? Cabinet Ministers, MEPs and union barons are 'warning' of a huge BNP breakthrough on June 4th. Four seats, seven seats, an irreversible change in the British political landscape - our most bitter opponents keep talking up our chances.

There's something wrong here. These people are without doubt wicked, but they are not stupid when it comes to political manoeuvring. They know full well that the biggest stumbling block for any growing party is the tyranny of the 'wasted vote'. So why are they giving us not only the oxygen of publicity but also a massive dose of the steroid of credibility?

Not, you can be very sure, because they've undergone a Damascene conversion. No, they're still up to no good; there is of course no change of heart, only a change of tactics.

So what is the reason for this? While it's impossible to learn their exact calculations, without doubt they involve some permutation of four factors:

First, ever since 1997, Labour has run a sophisticated private opinion poll operation. Using a model first developed by Joseph Goebbels to gauge public opinion in Germany, Blairite poll guru Phillip Gould set up a network of 2,000 focus groups, each meeting regularly, allowing those analysing their shifting opinions to record every tremor in the collective psyche of the British public.

This will without doubt have given Labour's top strategists an early warning of our potential; in fact, they probably know even better than we do just how much our support has grown, and continues to grow. In all probability, this will have forced them several months ago to the conclusion that there is little or nothing they can to prevent us making the crucial breakthrough of winning a seat in the European Parliament.

So they have moved to a damage limitation strategy. The trick is to exaggerate in advance our gains beyond all realistic expectation, so that when we 'only' win one seat the media can run stories about how the BNP is disappointed and by its 'failure' to make the 'widely expected breakthrough' of winning up to seven.

This, they would hope, would stop a new wave of enthusiastic new recruits sweeping us even further forwards, and set the scene for internal divisions as the naive look for scapegoats for our 'failure' to achieve victories which were never realistically on the cards in the first place.

Their second calculation is that an exaggerated 'BNP threat' is the only appeal strong enough to mobilise Labour activists who are disgusted with policies such as the privatisation of the Post Office and the stench of corruption from this rotten Government. If those activists sit on their hands, Labour faces near extinction in County Council government and a catastrophic drop in support in the Euro poll which could spark a leadership challenge bloodbath just a few months before the General Election.

Labour's strategists are well aware that while many of their grass-roots activists hate the Blair/Brown globalist agenda, they are hysterically opposed to the BNP, hence talking us up can whip them back to the front line for one more election.

Third, the same factor plays to a certain extent with their voters. Not with Labour's traditional working class base, much of & which has made the change in our favour already, but among their new block voters. These are divided into two categories: The middle class, polytechnic, town hall bureaucracy parasites whose numbers have exploded since New Labour took over in 1997. The vast majority owe their employment to Brown & Co., and are not only ideologically opposed to us but also will overwhelmingly vote for the party that let them in and which gives them so much taxpayers' money.

There is no better way to ensure that this new Labour block vote turns out than building up the BNP bogeyman so that Labour telephone canvassers can tell African asylum-seekers and Polish plumbers alike that "if the BNP win they'll cut your benefits on the day they come to power and will have you on a plane home by next week."

ETHNICS AT THE POLLS

Every reader who has been out on polling day in a hard-fought council by-election campaign over the last year or so will have seen this tactic paying dividends as Labour councillors and MPs shepherd groups of 'ethnics' to the polling stations in an often successful attempt to skew our democracy by swamping the native vote with newcomers. "BNP to clean up in Euro polls" is simply their way of rolling out this tactic from individual wards to pervert the result in the country as a whole.

The final calculation running through their heads will be that the Tories are near certainties to win the looming General Election. That's already a done deal, so ambitious Labour MPs in the Jon Cruddas mould are actually more focused on the General Election after next and are working on ways to ensure that the Tories only get one term in office.

Apart from adopting a 'scorched earth' economic policy, where mountains of debt poison the nation's prospects for twenty years, the only thing they can do to help to break the Tory revival is subtly to push the "Balkanisation of the 'right'". This tactic was successfully adopted by the French socialist government in the early 1980s, which even went so far as to introduce Proportional Representation in order to let the Front National win eighty seats in their national parliament. By splitting the anti-socialist vote the Left can retain or win seats where it would otherwise have had no hope. Politics is a dirty game!

By keeping a close watch on the figures in local elections all over the country, Labour's strategists will have worked out several years ago that, while we can and do take many votes from them, they have a hard left/bureaucrat/immigrant block vote that we can never win over.

In Tory wards, by contrast, a good BNP candidate can Hoover up nearly every single traditionalist and right-wing Conservative vote, while their liberal wing can be stampeded into switching to whichever of the Lib Dems or Labour is perceived as being most likely to keep out the BNP. While we damage the Labour vote, once the Tories are in power we will obliterate theirs.

The Conservatives - widely and justifiably known as The Stupid Party - are of course too daft to notice this. So David Cameron and others happily sign up to 'anti-racist' agreements and sponsor Marxist thugs to hit people in the face with hammers, while the real purpose of such groups' campaigns is to boost support for the Labour party.

So there are the four reasons for Labour's campaign to talk up our chances. What about the one big reason why they shouldn't be doing it - which is the clear and very real danger that by doing so they will make a self-fulfilling prophecy? Especially with the shocking state of the economy, parliamentary sleaze and the ever-present threat of another Islamist terror outrage, aren't they playing a very dangerous game?

The answer is yes, but here too, the risk will have been carefully calculated. People with extensive experience of involvement in one of the really big parties, especially those who cut their teeth in Marxist splinter parties or pressure groups, will be very much aware of the enormous qualitative gulf between a party capable of benefitting from a protest vote created by external events, and one which is able to consolidate such short-term gains into a stable, long-term ability to wield real power and influence.

They will also be heartened by the grotesque failure of UKIP to capitalise on its Euro election breakthrough five years ago, which was twice as big as even the wildest projections of how well we might do this time around, but which still went absolutely nowhere.

The sociologists and political scientists advising them will be well aware that small parties can be killed by sudden, mushroom-like success just as readily as by failure. Squabbling over the spoils of war and for newly available positions of prestige are part of the human condition and are as old as history. Thus it's a reasonable assumption for our opponents to make that the better we do the more chance there is that we'll collapse under the special strains of success, amid recriminations and internal division.

"Give them enough rope," Labour's strategists will have decided. "Once Griffin and even one or two others are out of the way and living it up in Brussels, those left behind will want to get their snouts in the trough and will launch a coup d'etat. It'll all fall apart within a year anyway."

As a matter of fact, it won't. Yes, a new crop of Establishment and far-left 'plants' are bound to circulate black propaganda tales of corruption and/or make superficially attractive arguments for 'separation of powers' that would put the party on the road to civil war. But they won't get anywhere. We've been at this too long to fail now; too many of our activists know that we would abolish their phoney, meddling, socially corrosive 'jobs'.

Parallel to the creation of this tax-gobbling welfarist bureaucracy, Labour has also embarked on the largest gerrymandering operation in British political history, bringing in literally millions of Third World and Eastern European immigrants knowing that they are too battle-hardened and wise to fall for such tricks. Simply to be aware of the danger is half the battle when it comes to overcoming it, while the other half is careful and professional organisation - which is very well underway already.

But, of course, the Labour party don't know this, and in any case their 'talk up the BNP' strategy is their only hope, so we can expect them to keep it going. Which does produce the risk that some of our more optimistic and impatient members will come to believe their wild predictions.

Don't! Be realistic. And never forget that we are in a political long war; there are no short cuts. We could just possibly win two or even three seats, but one remains the most realistic - though still ambitious - goal. For a demonised and oppressed party like ours - perpetually harassed by an array of opponents and most outrageous behind-the-scenes pressure - to win one single seat in the European Parliament would be an enormous breakthrough. And to 'fail' to do so would involve no shame.

Every single one of our members and activists must understand that we are going to make unparalleled organisational gains whether we get to Brussels or not. Winning a seat as well is of course our great ambition and prize, but it really would be the icing on the cake.

PROFESSIONAL CALL CENTRE

For our great organisational great leap forwards is already well under way. Our new and fully professional call centre will by now have contacted several thousand lapsed and current members. Even while this is still at the teething and training stage, this operation is netting several thousand pounds profit per month, though its greatest value will be in improving our conversion ratio for inquirers into members, and our membership retention rate.

The really good news is that the call centre is only a part of a much broader expansion and professionalisation operation which includes business, political administration and design and dispatch offices and a distribution centre.

This is not just a matter of bricks and mortar; the new premises are staffed by professionals: an IT systems officer, a qualified accounts technician, a chartered accountant and an administrator educated to MBA level. Even the younger and lower level new staff are required to have serious work experience. Our whole operation is now far too large and complex to rely on unskilled volunteers doing the occasional day in return for tea and biscuits or a four-pack of Asda lager.

We have also invested heavily in modern technology. Our new multiplatform integrated interface database is well on the way to going live and our cutting edge call handling network has already been installed. All our offices and home workers will be linked through our telecommunication system, allowing the instant and secure transfer of data and information.

These developments, together with our ongoing training and development programmes, will ensure that the Party is the most professional political organisation in the country. It's early days yet, but in the weeks and months ahead you and the whole world will see the tangible effects of our momentous re-structuring programme.

All this will allow us to cope with the record-smashing number of new enquiries that are going to be pulled in by our 29 million superb election addresses, two TV broadcasts, several million pieces of hand-distributed back-up literature, e-mail outreach campaign and our hugely popular website. On top of that, there will be the publicity generated by our presence with a campaign of this scale in an election fought against a background of unprecedented economic crisis.

We have no doubt at all that this will produce a minimum of 40,000 brand new enquiries. In all probability the final figure is going to be even higher than that. Many of these will never get further than studying our information pack and perhaps voting for us, but the systems we have put in place to follow them up will mean that a very significant minority will go on to become directly involved - as donors, members, activists and future good quality candidates and local officials.

This is the influx that is going to sweep us past our financial tipping point - the moment at which we move from having to live from hand-to-mouth, wearing down our treasury staff with an endless round of robbing volunteer Peter to pay amateur Paul - to a new level at which we can build up a strategic reserve, plan and budget ahead, and bring in professional help wherever needed.

Once the new professionalism is fully bedded in at a central level, we will cascade the skills and systems down through the party organisation, something that will further increase the virtuous upward spiral of growth and efficiency that is now operating with ever more obvious effect.

COLLAPSE OF UKIP

What is more, this period of well-grounded expansion by the BNP comes as our only serious rival for the position of popular grass-roots challenger to the Westminster elite - UKIP - is coming off the rails in one of the most spectacular political train smashes in modern British history.

Five years ago, the well-meaning efforts of UKIP's then confident and enthusiastic rank-and-file gave the Establishment the perfect safety valve with which to neutralise what even then was a serious level of popular resentment against all things Politically Correct. Aided by a shady clique of 'ex' Labour big cheeses, UKIP made stunning gains and claimed to be on the verge of reshaping British politics.

For various reasons that was always highly unlikely, but the party's fate was sealed when it was taken over by the BBC's favourite tame Euro-sceptic Nigel Farage. It took time for the long-suffering members to learn the full horror of Farage's egomania, sleaze, refusal to allow financial accountability, and removal of anyone who might object. But now those things are common knowledge, and last month UKIP reached its own tipping point - one into a vicious, downwards spiral of demoralisation and disintegration.

Just as the party needed maximum enthusiasm to raise funds for election preparations, a wave of resignations crushed its already broken morale. TV celebrity and author Robin Page resigned in a flurry of newspaper articles about dodgy finances and cronyism. UKIP's only

ELECTION COMMUNICATION - LONDON
EUROPEAN PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS JUNE 4th

The NEW Battle for Britain

NO to EU Rule & the Euro
NO to Immigration & Unemployment
NO to High Taxes & Rip-Off Britain

YES to putting British People First

"Because it's not racist to oppose mass immigration and political correctness - it's common sense!"

For a FREE poster to display in your window call 0207 078 3269 TODAY!

British Jobs for British Workers - Because We've Earned the Right!

Phone now for your FREE information pack 0207 078 3269
Or TEXT 'BRITISH' and your FULL name and address to 81400

only MP, Essex Tory defector Bob Spink, announced that in fact he'd never even joined the party and is certainly having nothing to do with it from now on. Respected economist Tim Congden jumped ship too, along with key and experienced Brussels researchers such as John Petley and Peter Cole.

Even the continued allegiance of Lord Pearson is in doubt, as he has realised that Farage's displeasure over his invitation of Gert Wilders to the House of Lords was based not on any legitimate concern for the party but on his jealous rage over the fact that Pearson got the TV interviews that arose and young Nigel was ignored.

UKIP's Eastern region organisation imploded over the imposition of a massively unpopular Farage flunkey with a bogus identity; respectable members in the West Midlands were mortified at the key organisational role given to a freakish six-foot-something transvestite, and the people who have made UKIP's South West region an isolated beacon of financial stability and probity threatened rebellion over attempts by Farage to loot their funds to pay for his own re-election campaign while refusing to allow his EU expenses claims to be audited.

More serious still, UKIP's last serious donor, patriotic businessman Alan Bown, is increasingly critical of the chronic waste and the lack of accountability and control - and especially over Farage's refusal to allow any dissent at NEC meetings, which he deals with by going into contrived juvenile temper tantrums, ad hominem attacks and summary expulsions.

The resulting tightening of the purse strings nationally is compounding the shocking state of finances in some key regions. At the start of March, for example, UKIP's 'war chest' in the East Midlands was a mere £8,000 - only just over a third of the amount already safely put aside by the same BNP region. In the South East the plug is being pulled on UKIP's regional e office, which will be shut down straight after the election, if not even before.

The only ray of light was the timely arrival of a Tory donor with a life-support donation of £100,000, although it is expected that Farage will add to internal tensions by allocating the vast majority of this to the vital cause of his own re-election.

Even UKIP members who are unaware of this behind-the-scenes mayhem cannot miss their party's slump into electoral oblivion. Our 41% victory in Swanley was comprised of our taking the whole 20% of the vote that UKIP had secured there last time, plus 14% from Labour's share and 7% from the Tories. This repeated our feat in the Boston by-election late last year, where we hovered up UKIP votes in the constituency where they had their strongest showing nationwide five years ago.

A further blow landed at the start of April when a first time BNP candidate secured almost double the UKIP vote in a ward near Bognor Regis, an area which returned the second highest UKIP vote in the country in the last general election.

BNP STRONGER

Small wonder that UKIP's membership, which a few months ago had 'only' dropped from a maximum of 26,000 to 13,000, has now slumped below 10,000 - which means that for the first time ever the BNP is not only by far the more effective of the two anti-EU parties, it is also the stronger in terms of straightforward numbers.

There is even 'worse' to come. One former and one current member of UKIP's National Executive Committee told me last month that they believe that their party will crash from winning twelve seats five years ago to just two or at most three seats "if we're lucky". While the BNP would be over the moon to win that many, UKIP has become so used to the staffing levels and political literature subsidies that come with each seat that the loss of so many of them will overnight add to their many woes the collapse of their central party machine.

Even those whose 'loyalty' to Farage is at present dictated by their position on the payroll will then have nothing to lose, and will with justification turn on the man who has led them to disaster. Either he will effectively complete the destruction of the party in order to avoid losing control, or he will be ousted in a multi-sided split which leaves the remnants of the party fighting a series of mini-civil wars to determine which ambitious but unknown bantam cock crows on top of the rapidly shrinking UKIP dunghap.

One side effect of the accelerating collapse of UKIP is already to be seen in the proliferation of new parties on a broadly similar wavelength. The latest group of former senior members to leave UKIP have formed one called UK First, announcing their intention of standing in at least two regions, including the South East as part of a bitter attempt to unseat Farage. With a reported war-chest of £40,000 already, they may well shave several thousand crucial votes off their old party's shrinking total.

Additionally, Declan Ganley - the Irish businessman who spearheaded his country's successful 'no' vote on the Lisbon Constitution - is aiming to field a full pro-referendum slate in the UK under the banner of Libertas, which is sure to take middle class votes from UKIP.

Also queuing up to throw his members' money away is Marxist rail union leader Bob Crowe, whose 'No to EU' group is presumably intended to give disgruntled Labour voters a non-BNP home (and to take advantage of the Free Post to deliver millions of anti-BNP propaganda leaflets) but will surely take more working class votes from UKIP than us. The more such Euro-sceptic groups fragment the anti-EU vote, the more it will cement the position of the BNP as the only serious party in this field.

We also intend to emerge from this election as the key intellectual opponents of the Europhile scheme. We are in the final stages of a massive research project into the shadowy and undemocratic origins of the EU. This has uncovered a truly shocking catalogue of evidence of an unholy alliance of banks, petro-chemical giants, globalist corporations, radical leftist bureaucrats and Saudi-financed Islamists.

This ground-breaking material will be used not only to inform our own people as to the true nature of the Euro Beast, it will also show the thousands of other Euro-realists to whom it will be sent just how shallow and weak has been the analysis of the problem supplied to them by UKIP's leadership.

All this patient preparation work will position us for a serious bid to become the vanguard of opposition to Britain's submersion within the European Union. This would mean that among the large number of newcomers swelling our ranks later this year will be significant numbers of former UKIP activists. They will be very welcome, not least because every one involved on our side is another denied to the Farage/BBC safety valve scam which has been neutralising Euro-realism for far too long.

The struggle to sound the alarm over the undemocratic, nation-wrecking schemes of the Europhiles is reaching the critical point in history. The economic chaos of the next few years will provide the opportunity either for freedom lovers to break the chains, or for the federalists to use the 'emergency' to fasten their shackles around every last wrist and ankle in a new European empire of naked tyranny. Which side will triumph in this titanic struggle for the soul and future of the West? That depends, at least in part, on what we achieve on June 4th.

For those who haven't been able to make a trip to London for some time, such a visit today might prove to be something of a shock. The number of people who could not be described as 'indigenous British' is startling. Those of us who still live and work here are rapidly having to get used to this new influx of diverse population without complaint. To put it bluntly, we have no option - we have to put up and shut up. This is because none of the political parties are to the slightest extent sincerely interested in what for some of us is a matter of deep concern: immigration. None, that is, except the British National Party.

The Data Management and Analysis Group updated figures issued in November 2008 for the GLA, which has just been extended to project to 2031, gives borough and ward population predictions based on ethnicity and makes for some anxious reading. I quote:

"Looking over the period 2006 to 2031, the total London population is projected to increase by 1,049,500 (14%). Over this period, the BAME (short for Black, Asian and Minority Ethnic) population is projected to increase by 949,700 (39%), and the White population by 99,900 (2%). Hence the BAME groups are projected to account for 90% of the increase in the London population over the 25 years from 2006."

Of course, indigenous Londoners don't require statistics to corroborate the evidence of their own eyes and ears! But it seems that our politicians, of all political persuasions, are determined to edit out the harsh facts of reality and what these will ultimately mean for the longsuffering people of Britain; those of us whose ancestors have lived here for generations and whose historic efforts built this once great capital city, which is now a haggard shadow of its former lustre, marred by a plague of crime, overcrowding, violence and despair.

Take Boris Johnson and his recent ludicrous proposal to grant an amnesty to illegal immigrants, of which there are thought to be 400,000 in London and 700,000 nationally. This suggestion by its very nature is immoral and thereby offensive to all of us who live here legitimately, because it necessarily rewards, and by so doing encourages, illegal behaviour! The Mayor of London has also naively and contradictorily advocated that British citizenship granted in such situations would need to be 'earned.' Frankly I don't see how coming here illegally can in any way be compatible with the concept of 'earning' one's right to lawful residence. But what is of grave concern is that such an amnesty is simply an open invitation for yet more migrants from abroad to try and gain a British passport by this proven successful method. So, having granted an amnesty to the hundreds of thousands already here, we will eventually find ourselves back again where we started, with a backlog of yet more innumerable hopefuls, all determined to try by any means to gain residence in a country which is already renowned for being a 'soft touch.' Similar measures have already been tried in Spain over the last 20 years with precisely the same result - an inevitable reoccurrence of the original problem.

I find it very hard to come to terms with Boris Johnson's reasoning. Apart from his failure to appreciate the plainly evident fact that London, and indeed Britain, is grossly overcrowded in all respects, I suppose that having to jostle to find a vacancy in Britain's ever contracting employment market in order to try and pay the bills is not one of life's realities as far as he is concerned. He has since compounded the idiocy of his amnesty proposal by seeking to defend it by maintaining, would you believe, that the inability of illegal immigrants to enter the legitimate job market and participate fully, was a "real problem for this city." He goes on, "I think there's a very good cause for a study into something that I think could not only lead to greater social justice, but also greater economic utility." But Boris, where will this leave the long-standing residents of London, who as a result of the activities of these newly legitimised job seekers won't be able to find employment in this down-turning recession, and who will need to be supported by state benefits as a result?

The Changing Face of London

IMMIGRATION 'BENEFITS'

Boris might well have exceeded expectations for tomfoolery with his amnesty proposal, but the sad and horrifying reality is that all the political parties are hopelessly out of touch with the expectations and wishes of the ordinary voter. The Conservative Party's website begins its section on immigration with the following audacious statement:

"Immigration can be a real benefit to the UK..."

In this misjudged assertion they unconsciously reveal their true colours and such are certainly not blue! Many, I think, would join with me in wondering what 'benefits' the mass immigration of recent times has ever brought to this country? Indeed, we are now reaping the bitter fruits of the misguided policies of governments from both ends of the political spectrum over the last 50 years. The increased demand brought about by immigration has caused a crisis in the availability of council housing, because there simply isn't enough to go round. The problem is further exacerbated by the fast-tracking of applicants on the basis of 'need' rather than duration of waiting time in the council housing queue. Given the fact that many newcomers have a tendency to possess large families, they often qualify for priority when the few houses that are available are allocated. On the labour market, imported cheap labour inevitably leads to unemployment of the established labour force, whose wages are necessarily forced down by unfair competition. Furthermore, the introduction of foreign ethnic groups with different religions, patriotic allegiances and ethical affiliations is bound to lead to a decrease in social cohesion and an erosion of personal and social identity and traditional aspirations. This loss is equally deleterious to both the in-comers themselves and the indigenous residents, the sad results of which can be seen in the deviance and disaffection of our youth.

The Conservatives go on to qualify their assertion by suggesting that in order to reap this 'real benefit,' immigration needs to be "properly controlled, with its impact on the economy, public services, and social cohesion taken into account." Of course, what and by whom the benchmarks are to be set is no doubt a matter for the men in grey suits. Of one thing you can be sure though, those in the upper echelons of government, who make the statistical policy decisions, are not likely to be the ones who have to confront real life problems on a permanent day to day basis, as do the white working class.

Does Labour fare any better on the subject of immigration? Given their record in government to date, I feel that I hardly need bore you by stating the obvious! However, a cursory examination of the Labour Party's website does not fail to disappoint those with a wry sense of humour:

"We are committed to building on the progress we have already made to create a system in which people can have confidence... We are building an immigration system fit for the 21st century, one which benefits Britain."

I think I hardly need comment further.

The UK Independence Party on the other hand is rather more ambiguous in its approach and I fear that there are some sensible, right-thinking people who might just be persuaded to fall for it. Their website proudly proclaims:

"The UK Independence Party is calling for a five year freeze on immigration into Britain and a future policy that would see migrants controlled by a points system similar to that operated by Australia and New Zealand."

However, the latter half of this seemingly sensible suggestion sounds alarmingly similar to one of Labour's propositions which can be found on their website under the blatantly misleading heading, 'Winning the Fight for Britain's future.' Labour announced that they are delivering:

"A new Australian-style points system (which began in February 2008) to ensure only those migrants we need can come to work and study in the UK."

So where does the British National Party stand on immigration? The BNP is the only party that advocates calling an immediate halt to all new immigration and the offering of generous grants to those of foreign descent here who wish to leave permanently. We believe in facing the facts: the current level of population is too high and there are steps that need to be taken to tackle it. This is a policy grounded in practical reality and is, we believe, very much in accordance with the true wishes of the British people. We cannot continue as a cohesive nation with our head buried in the sand in the vain expectation that our schools, hospitals, housing stock, financial resources and infrastructure will just somehow cope with the ever increasing demands that the rising levels of population are demanding.

For too long this country has been governed by a self-serving, liberal political elite, who have no empathy with the harsh realities of life experienced by the very people by whom they were elected to serve. For too long, these politicians have ignored the legitimate feelings, needs and aspirations of the majority of the population of this country. For too long the media barons who support them have held the justifiable concerns of ordinary Britons in gross contempt. For too long they have placated us with sophistry and apparent subtle arguments. But now they ignore us at their peril! Because their own statistics bear out the message that we, the British National Party, have been saying for years: the problem of the changing face of London, and indeed Britain, is that this change has not been for the better. And unless something sensible is done about it soon, it will have changed forever.

» As the BNP's elected representative on the London Assembly, Councillor Richard Barnbrook is well qualified to say that it is more than the face of London that is set to continue changing.

British Jobs for British Workers

Over the last month we have seen the BBC dirty tricks department in full action. From the deliberate distortion of the comments of British workers on the picket lines via duplicitous editing to the peddling of lies as facts on the news, the entire BBC state apparatus has swung into action to undermine the 'British Jobs for British Workers' movement.

The favoured smear trick of the liberal media journalists both inside and outside the BBC has been to attack the British workers demonstrating outside their factories and places of work by saying that the strikes are 'illegal'. This is supposedly correct as British and EU law says the contracts are legal and that EU law prohibits us preventing European workers from taking British jobs.

For a start only a gutless, simpering liberal wet would even think for a second that a British government that served the interests of the British people would not act in the name of British workers.

Regardless of what the damned EU says, we will act. Their law is only our law as long as they govern us. When we govern ourselves once more, then we will impose our laws.

A BNP government would, on the grounds of ensuring national security and public order, order an immediate derogation from any EU laws, WTO laws, European law directives or regulations that allow British or foreign companies to bid for British contracts whose workforce is drawn solely from a foreign nation, whether in the EU or outside it, and we will also forbid the issuance or awarding of any contracts where British workers are not allowed to apply for first and obtain those jobs in Britain.

» Lee Barnes, the BNP's legal adviser, explains why the only way we can guarantee this is by immediate withdrawal from those EU laws controlling freedom of labour. Further more, he shows that recent strike action by British workers is not illegal.

The fact that the lip-trembling liberals on the left and Tory fops on the right are both supine before political correctness, and will almost go into swoon when they read these proposals to put British workers first, simply tells us how debased our nation and politics has become.

We in the BNP are British Nationalists.

We place the interests of British workers first.

All British workers, regardless of race, colour, creed or class will be put to the front of the queue for British jobs.

At the same time as we impose our British Workers First Policy we will be taking action to ensure every illegal immigrant, every bogus asylum seeker, every economic migrant, every immigrant terrorist and political extremist, every visa overstayer, every illegal entrant, every naturalised convicted criminal and every sex slave or trafficked worker is removed from our nation.

From Australian barmen to Zairean call centre workers, if you are here illegally then we will deport you as soon as we find you.

The issue of deporting illegal entrants from our nation has nothing to do with racism - illegal entrants are of all races, creeds, colours and class. It is solely their legal status that concerns us, not their racial status.

The media seek to portray and conflate the issue of foreign labour and illegal entrants with racism, yet this is a completely facile and bogus smear.

The issue is solely about their legal status.

The present laws that allow companies to bid for British contracts by undercutting the bids of British companies by using imported non-British labour are in breach of the Race Relations Acts as they discriminate against British workers on the grounds of their nationality, this being British.

The failure of the companies who outsource their labour demands to allow British nationals to compete for those jobs in Britain where those jobs will be created, means those companies are directly discriminating against all British workers, as they have been denied the right to compete with foreign workers for those jobs. This attempt to ensure British workers cannot compete with foreign workers for British jobs is an escalating problem. From inserting statements such as 'British workers are welcome to apply for jobs but they must be able to speak Polish, Lithuanian or Italian' into job advertisements, to only advertising jobs in foreign trade journals, various businesses have sought to evade their duty under British law not to discriminate against British workers.

Therefore the contracts themselves that are signed under such circumstances are unlawful ab initio under the Race Relations Acts.

In order for the contracts to be legitimately and lawfully issued the contract bids should have reflected wages costs and associated labour costs based on including British workers employed in the UK who should have been able to compete for those jobs. The failure to include such British labour costings, and the fact that the bid costings were based solely on using imported cheaper foreign labour, means the contracts are void from the very beginning as being illegal under the Race Relations Acts. Illegal Contracts are void ab initio at common law provided the illegality was present at the time the contract was formed.

Therefore all such contracts that barred British workers from applying for jobs, and that were based on costings predicated on barring or excluding British workers from jobs, must be terminated under contractual law and resubmitted for tender. Any costs incurred as a result of this delay must be borne by the contractors that submitted unlawful bids.

The British workers on the picket lines are acting in defence of the law, not against the law.

By peddling lies to the masses, the media is defaming British workers and seeking to undermine public support for the strikers. This being done in order to uphold the credibility of the political parties that the media push into power with its propaganda.

These strikes are of immense importance to future labour relations and the rights of British workers.

If British workers keep allowing the government and the European Union to walk over them, and the establishment controlled trades unions keep supporting the rights of foreign workers to take away British jobs, then our rights as British workers will be totally swept away.

We must stand up now as a nation against the globalisation of our national labour market.

The British government must act in the interests of British workers, their families and their children. The government must act to ensure the rights of British workers take precedence over the rights of foreign companies and foreign workers to profit from taking British jobs.

The silence of the Socialists in the Socialist Workers Party is deafening, whilst the Left, the Tories and Liberals are either silent or even attacking the British workers! The Socialist Workers Party, the Labour Party, the Liberals and the Tories all despise the British workers - as they all support the globalisation of our nation and our work force.

The very fact that the media seem shocked that a BNP government 'dare' act to protect the rights of British workers shows us how debased our nation has become.

Whoever though the British people would be run by such fools, crooks, cowards and weaklings? It makes me ashamed to think they share my blood.

Our nation needs a nationalist revolution. It needs it right now.

British Workers Rise Up - Your Liberty Awaits!

SUPPORTING THE WILDCAT STRIKES

'Human Rights', Human Wrongs

» Tim Heydon describes how growth of 'Human Rights' is undermining English Common Law and progressively diminishing freedom throughout Britain.

The Human Rights Act 1998 put through by Tony Blair which allowed people to "claim their rights under the European Convention of Human Rights in UK courts and tribunal without having to go to the European Court in Strasbourg" is described by the Home Office as "one of the most significant pieces of constitutional legislation enacted in the United Kingdom." It was trumpeted by Jack Straw as "a major step in the creation of a culture of rights and responsibilities in our society."

The idea of 'Human Rights' as universal and good is regarded by the judiciary and the political class in general as self-evident. In a speech in Bangor in 2007, Lord Falconer, a crony of Blair's who might have stepped out of a Gillray cartoon as the quintessence of overfed lawyerdom and who was successively Lord Chancellor, Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs and Secretary for Justice, declared that Human Rights "are for everyone. They apply to everyone. They can be relied on by everyone. They are secured and guaranteed by the State, for all. Regardless of age, race, sex, or religion, they are a constant on which we can rely."

But under 'Human Rights' legislation, prisoners have the right to porn and gypsies have the right to squat. Children have rights which undermine parental rights. The parents of a Nottingham schoolgirl were kept in the dark while her school organised an abortion for her. Foreign terror suspects cannot be held without charge. They can live here on benefits paid for out of the hard-won earnings of the people they want to kill and maim.

Take an individual like the Islamic cleric Abu Quatada, for example. Quatada arrived in Britain with his wife and five children on a forged passport, and though wanted in Jordan where he had been sentenced to life imprisonment for plotting to kill tourists, he was subsequently granted asylum. He proceeded to preach hatred of Jews and Christians and urged worshippers in the mosques he frequented to kill non-Muslims. And he is still here, still protected by Human Rights legislation and still living off the labour of the taxpayer whose country he hates. All of this, and many similar cases, fly in the face of the public's ideas of justice.

There is a huge gulf between what the public wants and expects and what the political class is determined to see that it gets. This gulf arises ultimately from the deep differences between the British, or English, Common Law and legal system on the one hand and the legal traditions of the Continent and the Constitutional arrangements of the United States, favoured by the political class, on the other. The English Common Law is a democratic, built from the ground up system. It arose, not from decrees of high and dictatorial authority handed down to the people, as did such manufactured Continental systems as the Code Napoléon but, as the philosopher Roger Scruton has pointed out, "from local judgements made by those who regarded the king's tenure of authority as dependent upon his undertaking to uphold 'the law of the land'" (England: An Elegy). It is not based on vague principles such as 'Human Rights', which can be interpreted at will to suit the political bias of judges.

The Common Law is not written; it has built up over many centuries from the proceedings of the Anglo-Saxon moots on case law; that is, over centuries of judgements of specific cases based on the common sense and traditions of the people of the land. The judges who decided difficult cases did not make the law, as has been alleged. They discovered it in the already-existing law. And as it is rooted in binding precedent, it is less open to politicised abuse than is Continental Law.

COMMON LAW SUPPORTS FREEDOM

The from the ground up nature of the English Common Law has been vital in nourishing the English spirit; justice should be done for the individual regardless of the interests of power. Under the Common Law, whatever was not expressly forbidden was allowed. Under Continental systems, whatever was not allowed was forbidden. It is no wonder that where Continental people were held in subjection by their social and political superiors, their freedoms limited to what these superiors allowed them, the English considered themselves free people. They were characterised by their independence and their determination to stand up to power if justice demanded it. Their sense of freedom has been diminishing in recent decades with the weight of centralised legislation, in particular when politically correct. Now, it is receiving a further body blow with 'Human Rights', handed down by our political masters, which purport to grant or underline rights, but whose covert function is to take them away.

Given their origins in dictatorship and tyranny, it is no surprise that our political class, with its authoritarian tendencies and its contempt for ordinary people, finds Continental systems and attitudes so congenial, and the British people find them so alien and oppressive. For the removal of our freedoms and democratic rights which 'Human Rights' entails is not simply incidental to a system of laws which well-intentioned but misguided leaders have foisted on the British people. It is the purpose of those laws, which are a calculated and deliberate act of oppression and dispossession.

The politically correct do not want a legal system which is part and parcel of the culture of the English or the other nations of the United Kingdom. Such a legal system is utterly antipathetic to the multicultural or multiethnic agenda. They want a Continental system founded on an inhuman universalised 'Reason', a 'neutral' system which in reality they expect to serve up decisions which will suit their political agenda, and can easily be manipulated to do so. Their expectation is that under such an arrangement, the various ethnicities they are importing into the country will live happily, with no one ethnicity or culture and its legal system, including that of the British, having any greater power or authority than the rest.

FAVOURS MINORITY INTERESTS

So far from being for the mainstream and not for minorities only, as Lord Falconer asserted, although Human Rights legislation applies to everyone in the sense that all laws do, it has been put in place for the very purpose of favouring the interests of minorities against those of the majority. It is designed to circumvent popular opinion and democratic majority rights, to undermine the ancient basis of our laws in the history and character of the English, and to favour minority interests by referring conflicts to an 'impartial' system supposedly standing outside and above any one culture or ethnic interest, but where minority and individual interests are bolstered as against majority interests by being given equal weight, and tending to take precedence when they conflict.

This arrangement is also anti-democratic in that it is subject to interpretation by a few judges who are likely to have been chosen by the political elite for the very reason that they display the right kind of political bias. It is intended that there will be a double bias against majority interests and their ancient laws and traditions: in the nature of the legislation itself and in the nature of the judges who administer it. Thus, Human Rights legislation in the hands of these judges is a skilfully designed tool to aid in the destruction of the essence of the English spirit, the removal of huge swathes of debate and decision making from the public arena and the handing over of it to these complaisant lawyers. It is a means by which the liberal left has hoped to ensure that, whatever political party is in power, its own preferences will continue to shape Britain. 'Human Rights' legislation was and is essential to the agenda of dispossessing the British people of their country, their identity and their hard-won democratic rights. It is in short a dictatorial measure, oppressive of the British people in intent and execution, sly, insinuating and evil, a malignant, deadly enemy of the most successful and decent legal and political system the world has ever seen.

The sheer cynicism of the liberal left in the matter of their 'Human Rights' agenda is further revealed when we ask about the origin of the 'Human Rights' idea and why the liberal left cottoned on to its possibilities in furthering their aims. The liberal left's espousal of 'Human Rights' almost comically contradicts what are now, for most, its own most fundamental nihilist principles which deny the truth of religion and/or its place in the making of public policy. Charles Beitz, Professor of Politics at the University of Princeton, points out (What Human Rights Mean) that The Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the UN General Assembly in 1948 and upon which the European Convention of Human Rights is based, has no theoretical foundation. It merely asserts that there is an 'inherent dignity' in being human and declares certain values to be human, and leaves people in the various cultures to come up with their own reasons to support the declaration's practical requirements. Beitz says, "The absence of an official theory of Human Right is an embarrassment." The origin of the Human Rights idea should certainly be an embarrassment to the secularist liberal left, because the truth of the matter is that 'Human Rights' are derived from Western Christianity and have no ultimate meaning without religion and Christianity in particular.

While the idea of Human Rights is variously ascribed to the eighteenth century philosopher Immanuel Kant or to the seventeenth century philosopher John Locke, ultimately, 'Human Rights' derive from the medieval Christian idea of natural law as reflecting on earth the glory of the law of God in Heaven. In any case, as Walter Pannenberg of the University of Munich reminds us (When Everything is Permitted), Kant, in his Critique of Pure Reason, adhered to the view that moral conduct presupposed religion and the connection between God and morality was also maintained by Locke (and indeed by Rousseau). Other philosophers tried to detach morality from religion. But the Utilitarian philosopher Jeremy Bentham, who did not accept that natural rights were derived from natural law, surely had it right when he argued that once natural rights were detached from divine law they were based on nothing at all - hence his famous remark that talk of rights was "nonsense on stilts." But even if one were to accept the influential twentieth century British philosopher G. H. Moore's contention (Principia Ethica) that moral judgments are intuitions that can be neither demonstrated nor refuted by rational argument, God is still in the frame. For it is then, as Pannenberg points out, reasonable to view moral norms as merely emotion-driven preferences.

Without religion, although we are emotionally inclined to do so, there is no reason on earth why we should pay any attention to our own preferences, still less expect others to do so. All we might have is the power to coerce others whose preferences are different from ours, to conform to our own. And this is precisely what the secularist liberal left is doing when it imposes its own preferences: political correctness and 'Human Rights'. It makes a claim of a binding morality while doing so, a claim to which it is not entitled.

It cannot make any such claim because liberal left nihilism, the foundation of political correctness, takes the view that there is no ultimate meaning or absolute good and evil in the universe, because, it is claimed, there is no God and only religion can give such meaning. Because there is no absolute standard of good and evil, which only religion can give, the ideas of them we have are only relative. So if human beings see meaning in life, it is because they have given this meaning to it themselves. Therefore if, for example, we see intrinsic differences in worth between cultures, the sexes, races, or individuals, we have given this meaning to them. They don't really exist - they are 'constructs' which arise merely because they suit the book of oppressors. This proposition is self-defeating, because if morality is not fixed but relative, varying from person to person and group to group according to culture and circumstance, the politically correct cannot then hold that anything has any ultimate intrinsic moral worth, including political correctness itself. You cannot be a moral relativist and at the same time hold that there are moral absolutes or binding ethical preferences, such as 'Human Rights'. It is not for nothing that Fyodor Dostoyevsky, the great nineteenth century Russian novelist, remarked that, in a godless world, "nothing then would be immoral; everything would be permissible, even cannibalism."

HUMAN RIGHTS IS 'DOUBLETHINK'

But such considerations of total contradiction do not seem to bother the liberal left, which time and again demonstrates instances of Orwell's 'Doublethink': the capacity to hold two conflicting opinions at once. It took its ideas about the efficacy of Human Rights as judged by lawyers as a means of furthering its own political agenda from the way the US Supreme Court acted in the interests of liberalism in the United States. Robert H Bork, a former professor at Yale Law School, who was not liberal enough to be selected to sit on the U.S. Supreme Court, wrote on the liberal bias of that court.

In a chapter of his book Slouching towards Gomorrah, Bork demonstrated how politically biased Supreme Court Justices used their position to push a liberal agenda with judgments on the American Constitution and its amendments, contorting their plain meaning to favour radical individualism and inventing rights 'out of thin air.'

In the chapter, titled 'The Supreme Court as an Agent of Modern Liberalism,' Bork wrote: "The (Supreme) Court in modern times has regularly maximised individual rights against the corporate rights of all intermediate institutions ... When liberty and equality come into conflict, the Court almost always prefers equality, even in its modern, corrupt, egalitarian form." This, Bork goes on, "is a mood that cannot be derived from the Constitution. It is approved however by the intellectual class."

It is no wonder that, when contemplating the example of the American Supreme Court as a powerful political weapon in the hands of biased liberal judges, especially since the 1960s, British liberal leftists in power, many of whom are 1960s and 1970s radicals, favour 'Human Rights' adjudicated by biased judges and ultimately by a foreign, politicised Court. ."

And the 'Human Rights' legislation and the European Court is only part of it. As Bork remarks, "It is instructive that in the United Kingdom, the primary proponents of adopting a written constitution and the power of judicial review of legislation are the Labour Party and intellectuals."

The 'Human Rights' idea emerged at the end of the Second World War as a legitimate assertion of the dignity of humanity in the face of the revulsion felt by the activities of the atheistic Nazis and Japanese, to provide a basis for opposition to such gross abuses as genocide, state torture and so on.

It has since been seized upon by the liberal left as a means of furthering their political agenda and taken far beyond the intentions of those who signed the United Nations Declaration to the extent that its effects are now being felt in the minutiae of our daily lives. 'Human Rights' now masquerade as neutral, benevolent and rights-giving, but in the British context they are biased, malignant and freedom-destroying. Lord Falconer's assertion that "they are a constant on which we can rely" is false, except perhaps in that they may be relied upon to be constantly liberal left in orientation, if the plans of 'progressives' go as planned.

Those of this nation's ruling elite who wish to utterly destroy and dispossess the British people and undermine their ancient laws through 'Human Rights' legislation are guilty of the most evil acts ever perpetrated.

EXCALIBUR

Knowledge is Power!

Excalibur Books offers a wide range of informative books on the issues which directly affect YOU.

A Nation of Immigrants?
A brief demographic history of Britain

David Conway

A Nation of Immigrants? A Brief Demographic History of Britain (David Conway). Using genetic, archaeological and historical evidence, this book shows that the British people are NOT a "nation of immigrants" but a highly homogenous group with roots going back millennia. S/C 104 pp. £9.00

The Immigration Invasion: How Third World Immigration is Destroying the First World and What Must be Done to Stop It (Arthur Kemp). A shocking book detailing the full extent of the Third World immigration wave which is swamping the Western World. Shows that, if left unchecked, the First World will be overrun within the next 50 years. S/C 140 pp. £13.14

Virtual Caliphate

Islamic extremists and their websites

James Brandon

Virtual Caliphates - Islamic Extremists and Their Websites (James Brandon). Shows how Islamic extremists in the UK have websites circumventing anti-terrorism laws to spread their ideas, co-ordinate activities and recruit. S/C 111 pp. £9.60

Jihad: Islam's 1,300 Year War on Western Civilisation (Arthur Kemp). Puts the current crisis into historical perspective, showing that instead of being a "religion of peace," violent Islam has, in fact, been waging war on all its self-appointed opponents since its inception. Highly recommended. S/C 72 pp. £9.45

THE IMMIGRATION INVASION

ARTHUR KEMP

JIHAD

ISLAM'S 1,300 YEAR WAR ON WESTERN CIVILISATION

ARTHUR KEMP

England and the Need for Nations (Roger Scruton). The nation state provides the surest model for peace, prosperity, and the defence of human rights. Shows how the EU threatens this. S/C 63 pp. £10.20

A Cost too Far (Ian Milne). Shows that Britain's membership of the EU costs more than £40 billion p.a. not including the costs of the Common Fisheries Policy and our chronic goods trade deficit. Shows that Tory/Labour talk of 'lost jobs' is just scaremongering: S/C 97 pp. £10.50

The Public and the Police (Harriet Sergeant). Shows how Britain's police forces are crippled by political correctness and impossible "performance targets." Based on a genuine police officer's accounts, shows what decades of Tory/Labour policies have done. S/C 84 pp. £6.50

The Retreat of Reason: Political Correctness and the Corruption of Public Debate in Modern Britain (Anthony Browne). A devastating expose of the effects of Political Correctness and its poisonous effect of public debate in modern Britain. Has the left squealing in horror. S/C 121 pp. £11.40

All prices include postage and packaging.

Cheques/Postal Orders payable to "Excalibur"

Order by mail from Excalibur, P.O. Box 158, Deeside, CH5 2WW

Online at <http://excalibur.bnp.org.uk>

Or by telephone at 0871 0500 242

» Mark Collett, British National Party Head of Publicity, has worked on the design of Identity since 2004. Over the past five years the magazine has grown in both circulation and size, from a 16 page bi-monthly to a 32 page full colour publication. Here he presents a number of his favourite designs and past covers.

It became traditional to have a St. George's day cover for the month of April, this is my favorite. The actual image of St. George slaying the dragon is taken from a stained glass window in a church.

The selection of covers on these pages are some of the best from the last few years. They deal with a range of topics - from white history, white slavery, electoral targets, the economy and the two court trials that myself and Nick Griffin were involved in from 2004 until 2006 - one even saw the river Thames turn to blood to echo the famous speech made by Enoch Powell. If you like what you see, please feel free to go to www.identitymagazine.org.uk to view our growing archive of past articles and artwork.

Richard Barnbrook's GLA victory in May 2008 was the inspiration behind this pop-art cover of Richard looking out over a red, white and blue London.

taking back
London

Mohammed the bear was both topical and humorous in January 2008.

Monty the Mole appeared in January 2008 and was seen throughout the magazine thwarting Searchlight's attempts to cause a split in the party.

The BNP's exposure of the Peak Oil crisis was a running theme, this piece of artwork was not only eye-catching but was also copied by several mainstream publications.

Two of our popular covers were based on early '80s computer games Tetris and Space Invaders, the latter a joke at the expense of the Home Office who had been caught using illegal immigrant workers.

Here we go again, yet another British institution is accused of institutional racism. This time it is the English education system. Apparently researchers have uncovered evidence that white teachers are underestimating the abilities of some black pupils and consequently not placing them in the higher tier GCSE examinations.

Dr Steve Strand from Warwick University, the author of the study, said: "After accounting for all the measured factors, the underrepresentation is specific to this one ethnic group and indicates that, all other things being equal, for every three white British pupils entered for the higher tiers, only two black Caribbean pupils are entered." As a result of this in 2007 44.9% of Black Caribbean pupils achieved 5 or more A-C grades compared to 57.3% nationally.

He concludes that 'institutional racism' and low expectations by teachers explain the missing black Caribbean students from the top tier exams.

Dr Strand does not hesitate to explain what he means by institutional racism. He states that: "by institutional racism I mean organizational arrangements that may have a disproportionately negative impact on some ethnic groups."

He believes that teachers' judgements of pupils' academic abilities could be warped by behavioural problems. According to him teachers perceive that black Caribbean pupils are more confrontational and less well behaved.

Strand's research was based on the Longitudinal Study of Young People in England, managed by the Department for Children, Schools and Families in 2007.

Of course this is not the first time that the education system in England has been accused of institutional racism. Back in 1999 the then Chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality, Sir Herman Ouseley, said the same thing. Diane Abbot, speaking at a conference on the underachievement of black pupils in London schools in May 2003, also accused the English education system of institutional racism.

RACISM AGAINST WHITE PUPILS

There can be no doubt that institutional racism does exist in the education system in England but, as I shall demonstrate, it works against white working class pupils rather than pupils from Afro Caribbean backgrounds. A brief examination of the facts easily demonstrates this.

The most successful pupils in our education system are the Chinese, who in 2006 had the highest attainment rates with some 79.3% getting five good GCSEs. This without a Chinese History Month or any additional funding! The figure for Indian pupils was 71.4%, again no special privileges for this group in the form of additional funding or an Indian History month. Clearly racism is not a problem for these pupils.

Black Caribbean girls outperformed Caribbean boys by 16.5 percentage points in 2006. The girls from black African backgrounds did better than white boys: 56.1% getting five good GCSEs compared to 52.6%. The biggest improvement at GCSE level was among Bangladeshi children, 56.2% of whom got five good GCSEs.

Do black Caribbean girls experience less racism than black boys? Does this perhaps explain their better performance? Why doesn't racism impact on the performance of black African girls who in fact did better than white boys? Why have Bangladeshi children now overtaken Caribbean boys and white boys? The accusation that the education system is institutionally racist is absurd. Let us examine the real reasons why black Caribbean boys underachieve.

According to those who accuse the education system of racism, teachers apparently perceive that black boys are disruptive and ill-disciplined. Notice how these liberals use the word perceive, as if teachers are not seeing a real phenomenon taking place, but are just imagining it!

Unfortunately for these liberal researchers the evidence that black boys are poorly disciplined is well documented. For example black Caribbean and mixed black/white Caribbean children are excluded at rates three times greater than that for white children. Figures published by the Department for Education 2006 showed that the rate of permanent exclusions for Afro-Caribbean children was four in 10,000 compared with 1.3 for white British pupils. Chinese pupils had the lowest rates of exclusion 0.2 followed by Indian children at 0.5, Bangladeshi at 0.8 and Pakistani at 1. The reality is that 1,000 black pupils are permanently excluded from school each year and 30,000 each year for fixed periods.

Racism in E

» Matthew Roberts argues that institutional racism negatively affects white working class youngsters far more than Afro-Caribbeans.

An interesting response to the Warwick study came from Tony Sewell, a black university lecturer and writer, who said that too many black boys are influenced by a dominant peer group culture which appears more attractive to them than hard work and education

education as a way of improving their life chances, which is primarily due to the fact that they believe society is racist and that they cannot make it in a society that discriminates against them. I can understand why some of them feel this way given that they are constantly being told that they are victims of racism and discrimination by white liberals and professional black race hustlers who seek to promote a victim mentality amongst blacks and other ethnic minorities.

In contrast to the constant accusations of racism against the education system and the handwringing by the liberal establishment over black underachievement, there is an almost deathly silence about the underachievement of white working class boys.

According to further research from Warwick University, "white British pupils are now the most polarized ethnic group in terms of attainment." The report further states that "white British pupils living in disadvantaged circumstances are the lowest attaining group."

So what has been done about this state of affairs you might ask? Well, absolutely nothing! When ethnic minorities are underachieving they are allocated resources and additional funding. For example, black students can receive extra money in the form of an Ethnic Minority Achievement Grant. However there is no corresponding grant for white students who are underachieving!

NO HISTORICAL ROOTS

As I said earlier, I agree that the education system is racist but that it is only racist against white working class boys. How can one ethnic group receive additional funding and another not? This is discrimination and it is totally acceptable because the victims here are white! Can you imagine the outcry if the situation were reversed?

So why are white boys failing to reach their potential? There are many reasons for this including the breakdown of the family, poverty and low expectations from both parents and pupils. In my opinion we need to look at the way our young people are being alienated from their historical roots and their culture.

Multicultural education positively promotes black and ethnic history and culture but denigrates British culture. White working class boys are being disinherited of their culture and their history and they are made to feel guilty for the supposed crimes of their ancestors. Their role models are ridiculed and they are losing their sense of place and identity. Their sense of pride in who they are is being slowly destroyed. The psychological damage done to young white boys as a result of the deculturalisation of Britain is alienating many of them from the education system which no longer instils them with pride and identity. They see no future for themselves in a society that has abandoned them in favour of ethnic minorities.

Work that historically was available to them has been taken by immigrants who will work for a much lower wage, and of course many jobs have now been outsourced abroad leaving many white working class boys with a bleak outlook regarding their future work prospects.

Local authorities up and down the country continually discriminate against whites and favour ethnic minorities instead. Even the police force has stopped recruiting white officers for a period of time so that ethnic recruitment can take place to ensure that the makeup of the police reflects the ethnic composition of society.

It is vital that our education system is free from political correctness and revisionist history so that we can teach our young boys the truth about their history and make them proud of who and what they are. This will mean an overhaul of the curriculum and the sacking of Marxist and Neo-Marxist teachers who have no real interest in educating our young people but instead want to use the education system as a means of social engineering to realise their utopian dreams.

study. Indeed! He went on to say that the research was irresponsible and that it undermined the hard work that teachers did and made blacks articulate victims. Well done Mr Sewell.

FATHERLESS FAMILIES

Of course the real reasons that black boys underachieve, apart from those outlined above, are that too many of them come from families without a father. Some 63% of blacks are raised in fatherless families in the United Kingdom. Many of these families have been described as turbulent. Without appropriate male role models these boys grow up without the discipline and guidance of a father. Black girls, on the other hand, see their mothers as role models.

Too many young black males do not see the importance of y

Control of the Internet

» Councillor Mark Burke of BNPTv believes that a closer examination of the BECTA report (briefly commented upon in John Bean's Nationalist Notebook, November 08) shows that Internet 2 could work to nationalists' advantage.

Both Simon Bennett and I have disagreed with the original interpretation of the BECTA Report in Identity. I also have a different view of Internet 2, which is, in fact, a long overdue overhaul of the current, hopelessly limited, twisted copper wire-based Internet that must be replaced by optical cable as soon as possible in order for business, etc. to develop at the rate it needs. Additionally, we can all benefit from this exciting new development, which includes such advantages as speeds of 25mbps plus. This is something which has been enjoyed by our French colleagues for 20 years now, albeit mostly in big cities.

There will not be any restrictions in the way that was touted as Big Business does not want this and political parties, certainly in the UK, would fight as one if the incumbent Government of the day were to use its temporary power to limit such sites. (I am sorry if experience tends to make me suspicious of such altruism. - Editor) Any such references in the BECTA report are inferring to harmful material, such as porn (over 50 percent of Internet traffic is based on this), plus a host of sites that are clearly outside of the spectrum of acceptability (i.e. Islamist extremists and others that can/do incite hatred or revolution).

The roll-out of WiFi in certain cities enables future IT technology to take advantage of Internet based services competing with TV/Retail outlets. Internet 2 and WiFi offer enormous opportunities for the BNP. We can use them to bypass the Government controlled mass media - and there is nothing they can do about it.

DIGITAL DIVIDE

The BECTA report is clearly aimed at the all important subject of the digital divide that is developing in the UK, where the children of families who are below a certain income threshold suffer due to the lack of funds. This number is not insignificant and is a growing cause for concern as IT skills for the 21st Century are seen as such a cornerstone in education.

The report identifies that in order for this to be addressed, the Government, Business and Education should all work together to offset the imbalance and effectively educate not only the children but also the parents, as their IT skills/knowledge is acknowledged as also being poor.

The report constantly stresses terms like optional, cooperation and suggestive, contrary to the seemingly coercive nature that is implied in the article in Identity. (Yes, and so does most of the Marxist teaching that has come down from the thirties Frankfurt school - Editor)

For example, given that the three options offered to those identified as being below the line of financial capability, namely ownership, leasing or borrowing, it came as no surprise that overwhelmingly the 500 plus respondents to the online questionnaire chose the last as being optimum to their circumstances.

Not many are able to keep up with technological advances simply because they cannot afford to continually replace hardware. Seen in this light, leasing with an option to continually upgrade is a viable alternative for a market which is financially incapable of high ticket value purchases even at the best of times.

Another point to bear in mind is that the success of this concept depends on the parents in these low-income families assisting their children in accessing technology. Their socioeconomic status is, however, the very reason why their offspring are unable to access any of this technology in the first place. More often than not, the parents would need just as much help to stay updated as their children would.

Finally, the experiment's ultimate success relies on the active and generous support of the business community. Given the current economic climate, even the most well-intentioned of businesses are likely to put profit-making projects at the top of their priority list.

The various systems mentioned which would supposedly restrict access are things which only PCs themselves can do, be they pop-up blockers, malware checkers and parent-installed censorship programmes. There is no indication that certain political sites will automatically be blocked.

The documents, and references throughout, are aimed at helping those most in need, of which our party has a fair share with lower incomes. Anything that offsets this IT imbalance is more of a benefit to us than a hindrance. I, for one, hope that this venture succeeds, as anything which spreads IT literacy will ultimately be beneficial to the party.

Roll on BECTA and Internet 2!

EXCALIBUR

KNOWLEDGE IS POWER

WHEN EUROPEANS WERE VICTIMS . . .

Europeans are continually bombarded with reminders of the trans-Atlantic slave trade and colonialism. All the ills affecting ethnic communities today are often blamed on the legacy of those times—but nothing is ever said of when Europeans were the victims of slavery, imprisonment, war and terror—and no European people attempt to blame their social ills upon long gone events . . .

White Gold: The Extraordinary Story of Thomas Pellow and North Africa's One Million European Slaves (Giles Milton). The true story of the Muslim slave trade in Europeans, focussed on the actual story of the capture in 1716 of a Cornish cabin boy named Thomas Pellow and fifty-one of his comrades by the Muslim Barbary corsairs. Sold as a slave, Pellow was enslaved for 23 years—but survived to tell his shocking tale. S/C 316 pp. £9.59

White Cargo (Michael Walsh). "The long-lasting effects of slavery" are used to blame whites for problems affecting the black community to this day — yet rarely is anything said about the trade in white slaves, which flourished at the same time. This revolutionary book uses letters, diaries, and court and government archives to demonstrate that the brutalities so often associated only with black slavery were perpetrated on whites as well. S/C 320 pp. £13.14

The Black Hole of Calcutta (Noel Barber). The infamous Black Hole of Calcutta incident took place on June 21, 1756, when 123 English prisoners suffocated to death on the orders of Siraj-ud-Daula, Nawab (ruler) of Bengal. This incident spurred England on to take control of that continent. S/C 272 pages. £9.59

The Wolves of Islam-Russia and the Faces of Chechen Terror (Paul Murphy). Have you ever wondered who is behind the continuing terrorist atrocities in Russia? This book reveals the truth behind terrorism in modern Russia and the radical Middle Eastern origin Islamist terrorists behind the continuing conflict in Chechnya. Vital to understanding modern Russia, and the threat which Islam poses to that nation. S/C 281 pp. £14.00

The Fall Of Constantinople: The Ottoman Conquest of Byzantium (David Nicolle). The Christian citadel of Byzantium fought for survival against hordes of Muslim attackers for nearly six centuries, until, in the mid-15th century, the last emperor Constantine XI saw the city seized by the Islamic Turks. A dramatic and blood-stained story of Muslim aggression. H/B 256 pp. £21.60

The End of Barbary Terror: America's 1815 War Against the Pirates of North Africa (Frederick Leiner). The Muslim slave trade in Europeans was only ended when the United States of America sent a naval task force to attack the Islamic Barbary pirates off the coast of North Africa in 1812. A real-life naval adventure, a story of Islamic terrorism, white slavery, poison gas, diplomatic intrigue, and battles with pirates on the high seas. H/B 256 pages. £21.60

All prices include postage and packaging.

Cheques/Postal Orders payable to "Excalibur"

Order by mail from Excalibur, P.O. Box 158, Deeside, CH5 2WW

Online at <http://excalibur.bnp.org.uk>

Or by telephone at 0871 0500 242

John Bean's Nationalist Notebook

BNP - the only party supporting British Workers

British Jobs For British Workers

The BNP belief that the so-called differences offered by the established party triumvirate is a myth has again been justified in their attitude to the recent British workers' wildcat strikes in an attempt to protect British jobs from unfair foreign competition. The Lib-Lab-Con has unanimously warned our workforce that they must not be xenophobic and that the very concept of protectionism in relation to jobs is an evil that "plays into the hands of the BNP". They tell us that global action is the only way out of the economic disaster facing us, yet it is globalism itself that caused it. It is globalism that has seen 250,000 Britons lose their jobs in the last three months bringing a total in excess of 2 million unemployed while 200,000 immigrants have come in to take most of the remaining jobs.

Like the majority of the strikers at Total's Lindsey oil refinery, where the wildcat strikes first began, the BNP has nothing against fellow Europeans such as Italians, Portuguese or Poles, but it is through EU rules that we have seen the influx of European welders and pipefitters to take jobs that have been refused to British unemployed refinery workers with years of experience. It should be noted, however, that more than 151,000 people from outside the EU were given permission to work in Britain last year. That was a 17% increase on the 140,000 handed out during the whole of 2007. Indians were the largest recipients of work permits at almost 50,000.

The Daily Telegraph recently reported that almost all the growth in new jobs over the past seven years could be accounted for by immigrants. There were 1.34 million more people in work than in 2001 but the number of British-born workers fell by 62,000 over the same period. It also emerged in January that there were at least 170,000 more migrant workers than official figures suggest because of undercounting in the employment statistics.

Since Lindsey and the supportive wildcat strikes that took place elsewhere, including Scotland, Wales and Ulster, there has been the abrupt dismissal of 800 agency workers at BMW's Mini production plant at Cowley, and the growing resentment at Cammell Laird's Birkenhead shipyard, where ship fitting contractor Trimline is bussing in Polish workers for work on a Royal Fleet Auxiliary vessel.

What do the established trade unions say about all this? Their response has been to conform to New Labour's globalist doctrine. The Unite union sold the workers a pup when they got the strikers to return to work because the union had got the Total management at Lindsey to allocate 102 jobs to local British workers. The fact is that these 102 jobs were already secure and the management had expected that they would have to allocate as much as 700 jobs to locals!

The BNP, and the independent new trade union Solidarity (see p.2) have been very active in supporting the wildcat strikers. As Scottish Herald writer Ian MacWhirter wrote in his paper on February 2: "In the 1930s, the Jarrow Crusade marched on London to demand work; now in 2009, they will be marching to demand foreigners are sent home. The British National Party is finally in from the cold - inheritor of the great tradition of British industrial militancy."

Lloyds' Bankers and the Labour Party

As this issue goes to press the hard-pressed British taxpayer has a 43 per cent stake in Lloyds Banking Group, which last month announced a £11bn loss, mainly due to the takeover of HBOS (formerly the Halifax Building Society). As directors and senior staff prepare to join others at the City banksters trough to enjoy their bonuses - even if somewhat reduced, Lloyds has dismissed as "tosh" speculation that it will be nationalised, despite the fact it had already gobbled up half the £17bn cash (our money) pumped in by the Government at the beginning of the year.

Could Lloyds Group's confidence that Gordon Brown will not nationalise them be due to the strong links with the Labour Party of Lloyds Chairman Sir Victor Blank? Sir Victor was Chairman of Trinity Mirror from 1999-2006, which is virtually the media propaganda wing of the Labour Party and which leads an attack upon the BNP based on half-truths and down right lies. He is also still involved with the Labour Friends of Israel organisation.

It is not just Lloyds Group, but wherever you look at British and Western banking in general, none of them seems to want to fully disclose the extent of their sub-prime liabilities. As we have said before this was the trigger that set off the inevitable collapse of the globalist financial system. Just to remind you this arose from the setting up, via Democrat-sponsored Freddy Mac and Fannie Mae, of cheap mortgages to poor Blacks and Mexican immigrants, who have now become known as NINJAS - No Income, No Jobs, No Security.

It is all very well for President Obama to vent his anger on the US bankers who, like ours, are still claiming their big bonuses, but according to the Sunday Telegraph 01.02.09, Obama played a curious part in the sub-prime debacle. At the heart of it was a 1995 amendment to the Community Reinvestment Act which required banks to lend the money to the millions of poor and guaranteed by Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae. "No one campaigned more actively for this change to the law than Mr Obama, as a young but already influential Chicago politician.... And in 2005 no one more actively opposed moves to halt Fannie Mae's reckless guarantees than Senator Obama. And as the official records show, no senator received more donations from Fannie Mae than he did."

"I'm Progressive - Not a Right-winger" says Cameron

With the mounting unpopularity of Gordon Brown and the Labour party one would expect to see the Tories sweeping the council by-elections that have been held this year. Where BNP candidates have stood, notably in Newcastle-on-Tyne, Cumbria, Manchester, and Bexley it is the BNP that picked up the dissatisfied former Labour vote to propel it into second place in each seat. In fact in Bexley, where BNP's Michael Barnbrook missed winning by only eight votes, he also picked up many former Conservative voters in this Tory stronghold.

The reason for this lack of

Grovelling again - Cameron

enthusiasm by former Tory voters must be that they are beginning to see that there is no "clear water" between any of the major parties, who fully justify the BNP's generic label of the Lib-Lab-Con party. Their leader, Dave hug-a-hoody Cameron, in a speech to think-tank Demos on January 21st last, made a direct pitch to Labour and Lib Dem voters and declared himself a "progressive Conservative". He said that its four aims were a fair society, a green environment, safety for citizens and equal opportunity. Well, there is nothing wrong with any of that, but it hardly represents the key political issues of the day although, being generous, 'safety' could mean more attention to controlling crime. Surely, people would want to see that a party is going to give main emphasis on doing something about: the economic crisis with its growing unemployment; the problems related to mass immigration; whether or not we should try, at a minimum, to modify the effects of EU legislation which now supersedes anything from our Parliament. The BNP answer of withdrawal from the EU is, of course, the only real way out of this last problem.

Now that the 'big beast' Ken Clarke is back on the front bench as the shadow business secretary, it is a fair bet that the Tory party will now be more pro-EU than ever. In a speech at University of Nottingham last month he said:

"Obama doesn't want his strongest European ally led by as Right-wing nationalist, he wants them to be a key player inside Europe, and he'll start looking at whoever is in Germany or France if we start being isolationist". In case you are still falling about laughing at the suggestion of Dave boy being a 'Right-wing nationalist', he quickly made it clear at his speech at Demos that "I'm progressive, not a Right-winger".

Darwin on 'Favoured Races'

The bicentenary of Charles Darwin's birth has led to renewed discussion of his Origin of Species, particularly between evolutionists and the creationists who follow the strict interpretation of the Bible's account of the Universe being made by God in seven days just 6,000 years ago. Surely, the countless skeletal and fossilised remains of so many animal species, including early man, going back a million years or more indicates that we have arrived by evolution. To support Darwinism - even with reservations - does not mean that one is denying the existence of God, Christian or otherwise. Although he gently criticised some aspect of Christian fundamentalism, nowhere did Darwin deny God's existence or attack Christianity.

A reservation on Darwin's theory of evolution, which I hold, is that a satisfactory explanation is still lacking over the fact that after many imperceptible genetic changes in a species there should suddenly be a big jump in change, creating the beginning of virtually a new species? Is this the work of some hidden force, perhaps the same force that created the big bang where it all started? We will leave this to the theologians.

In the numerous media articles on Darwin nowhere does its full subtitle appear: On the Origin of species by means of natural selection or the preservation of favoured races in the struggle for life. The use of the word "races", and "favoured" ones at that, which appeared in the original subtitle is anathema to today's egalitarian, multiracial society. However, Darwin's evolutionary theory did not mean that it led to superior races in species, including homo sapiens, but rather different races among species. Above all, there are superior and inferior, strong and weak, intelligent and unintelligent individuals in all races., whether we are talking about homo sapiens, tortoises or chimpanzees.

In evolution, as a result of chance mutation there occurs genetic variations in some members of a segregated group, which accumulate in the progeny of that segregated group. At first, these variations do not make the segregated group different enough from the original species to justify calling it a new species or even a new "favoured race" of the original species. However, after many generations the segregated group or tribe which had accumulated sufficient genetic differences through chance mutation would be called a new "race" of the original species.

There is really no probability that the "races" (whether human or other animal species) would be equal. In fact the whole notion runs directly counter to all evolutionary theory and to the whole science of biology.

Darwin: "Evolution favoured different races"

Multi-cultural Musical Pathway

An advertisement for "Music is for Life 2009" to be held at London's Albert Hall 30 March tells us that we can experience the power and joy of music-making by 1,450 young musicians from the London Borough of Merton "in a dazzling display of music and performance from around the world". As someone who believes that we should encourage all forms of music, an immediate reaction was good for the Borough of Merton. But I had some reservations on reading:

"Witness the world premier of an important new work - 'The Journey' - composed by Pete Churchill for mass primary choir, youth harmony choir, instrumental and vocal soloists and a cross-genre 'fusion' (a dog's dinner?) band. This work explores the history of immigration in Britain over the past 1,000 years to create a musical pathway through the many multi-cultural influences which have played a part in the development of our nation."

Apart from the fact that disintegration would be a better choice above than development, this is another example of the distortion of our history to brainwash our youth into believing that we have always been a multiracial nation. Unfortunately the schools no longer tell them that until 1948, the only substantial number of immigrants to these islands over the past thousand years have been some 10,000 Normans (descendants of Norsemen), some 50,000 Flemings and Huguenots (all indistinguishable from our original Celtic, Anglo-Saxon and Viking descendants), since 1660 some 200,000 Jews, and perhaps 30,000 more fellow Europeans, such as Poles, Czechs and even German ex-servicemen, immediately after World War Two.

The liberal-left establishment is also expert at subliminal means of changing the ethnicity of our history. The Royal Mail has recently issued a series of six stamps depicting 'RAF Uniforms'. One of them is a representation of an air gunner of 1941 who appears to be a Negro. Of some one thousand West Indians who volunteered for RAF service during the last war, only three were aircrew. The stamp would suggest that one in six was a flyer. I was too young to see active service, but in my weekends training in RAF Reserve for pilot/navigator at RAF Halton I never saw even one non-white ground crew, yet alone aircrew. The only person of colour was a fellow Reservist from Cumbria, who became a friend, called John Black. His 'blackness' came from an Indian mother, apparently.

David

Speakers' Corner

PO Box 97, Newmarket, Suffolk, CB8 1WT, England. E-mail: identity@bnp.org.uk

LETTER OF THE MONTH

>> Learn From History

Re your article "We must learn history's lesson by Bishop Auckland MP Helen Goodman. Ms Goodman refers to me by name and gives an inaccurate account of a conversation at a constituency surgery.

The Northern Echo

She comments on my dismissal (as a teacher) and accuses me of 'crazy lies'. She also states that my brother and I faced disciplinary charges, but fails to mention that no charges have ever been proved against us.

I was actually dismissed for the sickness caused by over nearly two years of harassment and persecution by my employers. Her prejudicial comments (like those made by County Durham officials earlier) were made prior to my appeal being heard.

Does Ms Goodman deny writing letters or meeting with people regarding my case and that of my brother? Does she deny seeking to influence whether my brother and I hold teaching positions? Ms Goodman may not have the power to sack public officials as an MP, but she has influence.

It is certainly important to learn from history. In that light I note that the Nazis sought to ban categories of people they didn't like from holding public positions. Later, McCarthy tried to conduct witch-hunts in the US. What a fine tradition for Ms Goodman to follow.

Mark Walker
Spennymoor, Co. Durham

(This letter was published in The Northern Echo. It was chosen by the editor as Letter of the Month and the author receives a year's subscription to Identity).

>> Support British Jobs

It is said that unemployment is approaching the two million mark. (It has exceeded this now - Editor) However this figure does not include those on training schemes or the large numbers on incapacity for either genuine reasons or because they have lost all hope of ever finding a regular job. Hence our support for the recent strike of workers demanding "British Jobs for British Workers".

We have never been in a situation like this before. Manufacturing jobs will not be replaced and the sector could even die out completely unless the workforce is prepared to match the low pay and conditions of China or Eastern Europe. Once Africa catches up with the rest of the industrial world the prospects will be even bleaker for the British worker who will have to take severe pay cuts and fit in with the global market rate for what the job is worth. What is needed is a Nationalist approach to industry as advocated by the British National Party whereby we trade with British based manufacturers as much as possible, only importing goods which we can't grow or make to an acceptable standard ourselves.

The alternative is high unemployment, insecurity, repossessions, and low paid work.

Shipyards, coal mines, railway and steelworks need to be re-opened and invested in.

However this won't be easy because thirty years of neglect by the Tories and New Labour has seen a lot of the skills needed for these vital jobs become few and far between.

Trevor Agnew
Darlington

>> Muslim Support

I am glad that the BNP would withdraw British troops from Iraq and Afghanistan and refuse to take part in any illegal pre-emptive war of aggression against Iran or other Muslim states. I am also glad that the BNP would not get involved in Israel's war against Palestinians.

As a white British convert to Islam I would say that I too oppose this massive influx of Third World Muslim immigrants into Britain. The stance of Islam is that it is obligatory for the Muslim to live in the lands of the Muslim except under certain circumstances which the vast majority of immigrants simply do not meet.

John Hassan Bingley
Markfield, Leics

>> Why Aid For India?

We should now stop all foreign aid and spend the resultant savings at home. On his visit to India a few months back, Gordon Brown gave that nuclear-armed country £875 million in aid, yet India recently landed its space probe on the moon (more than we have done)!

Any such gifts, for they are not loans, almost entirely end in the wrong hands to enrich the lives of politicians and bureaucrats. Many of our former colonies, which before independence were rich and well-governed, are now basket cases. Even the left-wing BBC has chosen, in its Panorama programme, to depict the mismanagement of aid in Sierra Leone and Uganda.

Our taxpayers are still paying for Empire, but we receive none of its benefits. Countries which formerly belonged to us demanding independence, which they were given. They should learn to put away their begging bowls and Brown should learn to keep his hands out of our pockets.

P.G. Willis
Paignton

Church Bigots

The Darton church magazine (Barnsley) of November 08 carried a note from the parish priest, one Simon Reynolds, which read: "as long as I am here, no member of the BNP will lay a wreath in Barnsley".

As an ex-serviceman who has seen active service I was aghast at the terminology of this priestly bigot. I therefore wrote a letter of complaint regarding this non-priestly fellow to the Bishop of Wakefield. Would you believe it, I received a letter back giving his support for the local priest. I wrote back to the Bishop telling him that he was as big a bigot as his priest. This is the UK's church today.

(If I remember correctly, Barnsley BNP did lay a wreath in honour of our war dead last November - Editor)

S.B. Wroe
Market Rasen

Losing Our Identity

I would like to thank Danny Burney of Alabama, USA, for his supportive letter in the January edition of Identity. As he wrote, we should not be forced to integrate, but we continue to be forced into doing so. The result is that we are losing our identity and losing our culture.

I forget who the wise person was (a BNP member?) who said: "To destroy a nation, first take away its identity".

Can anyone explain why our government continues on this course?

Mary Barson
Wigston, Leics

Forcing Children To Celebrate Islam

Just before Christmas my three-year-old daughter excitedly handed me an Eid celebration card that she had made at nursery school. Inside the card an assistant teacher had glued in a label with the wording "Eid Mubarak" and written below it "Love from Sophie" (my daughter's name. I was deeply offended by this and reported my objection to the headmistress.

I am concerned that my children will be and are being taught about Islam in general as I do not trust the Marxist education system to teach our children any of the pitfalls of this religion. With that said, I would accept that my children are educated about religion of all types as long as it is taught in a balanced fashion. However, making young children celebrate Islam in nursery school or at any other level is a totally different kettle of fish. This 'celebration' endorses the wording found in the Quran, Halal ritual slaughter and the very many other negative images and well-documented atrocities associated with some of the followers of this religion.

Please note this is the same school where my 10-year-old son was interviewed and made to sign a document stating that he understood that he had been involved in a racist incident (without his parents knowledge or attendance). His crime was asking a pupil during a geography lesson "Is your mum from Pakistan?". The comment was made after the fellow pupil had told my son his mum was from the U.A.E.

Mike Bell
e-mail

Threat To Live Music & Musicians

The government is considering a legal requirement to introduce laws insisting that anyone applying or re-applying for an entertainment license must have a noise control device fitted to the venue. This will be the final nail for all entertainment in the UK, including small clubs, village halls, British Legion, etc, as the level at which these devices cut you off is extremely low and damaging. The proposed level is 70 decibels.

The 70 db level at which these devices cut the power off is ridiculously low, about the same as a hair-dryer or a sewing machine. Nearly all music equipment (even unplugged acoustic instruments) will produce more volume than this.

Venues are suffering enough as it is without being forced to go to the expense of fitting one of these devices. Noise limiters are a menace to live music, and I expect this is the bright idea of some unelected suit in Brussels that's never been to a gig in their life.

Please publicise this latest threat to our freedoms and complain to your MP.

Dave Saunders
e-mail

The Cost Of Immigrants' Remittances

The pound has dropped relative to the Euro, despite a recent slight recovery. Anyone wondering why they cannot afford a holiday in the Costa del Sol may be interested to know that remittances from the UK by immigrants could be part of the explanation.

The government does not seem to have a figure for remittances, although they do publish a figure of £4 billion going overseas which "includes remittances". But this could be a wild underestimate. An Indian banker estimated remittances from Britain to India alone are £3 billion. But Indians and Poles are only a small proportion of all immigrants. If other groups of immigrants are remitting similar sums, the total could be nearer £40 billion than £4 billion: a serious dent in our nation's balance of payments.

Ralph Musgrave
Co. Durham

A Home Is For Life, Not Just For Christmas

Now that we find ourselves in the spring, the memory of Christmas is fading fast. For many who find themselves habitually sleeping on the streets, this horrific nightmare, from which, thanks to the efforts of dedicated charities, Christmas offered a temporary respite, continues. Indeed, it is made even more acute by the freezing wintry weather.

Many vulnerable people find themselves confronted with the predicament of homelessness through no fault of their own, because they have fallen on hard times. The government's official estimate for 2008 is that there are about 500 people sleeping rough in England at any one night, and about half of these can be found in Greater London. Of those in London, 12% have been in care, and shocking to relate, 6% formerly in the armed forces. 43% have been in prison.

The government has made a commitment to end rough sleeping by 2012 but whether this promise is actually kept remains to be seen. I for one will be watching carefully to see that it is, because given the massive amount of public money that is being thrown at the 2012 Olympics, if this target is not achieved then to my mind there will be no excuse. A society that calls itself civilised cannot be prepared to sit back and turn a blind eye to such a social evil.

Cllr Richard Barnbrook
London Assembly Member

Welsh

at Blun

'race s

AVID Blunkett

by the Welsh

anti-racism

Sec

Shaw should be ei

in their career

quipping "Celtic succeeded "de

referee Jackson has dominated for more than in black and

in Cardiff

Blunkett: play

her Welsh man-

P win

lows

ilante

rning

ok Hennessy

Political Editor

Right British Na

on his fifth c

last May - ap

n advance by exit

it's local electio

"s success was in terred across the

um and came a da

referee David Bl

f possible civil i on fears.

only seems, the

on Calderdale's

orkshire in a by-e

about half third

Liberal Democr

ner was father of arism, 45 who to a Maseraden won

in areas which h

black voters.

Shaw, Labour MP

These people ar

4 sails but under

y are the same

signs trying to bri

over their "Sh

some consolation

at only one in 10

3 for the BNP.

It followed Mr Bl

ning yesterday di

r asylum seekers

into vagrant traf

owning crime

Home C

Hughes

FOR

HUG

ER

is asyl

ars as opens

Secretary David

in seekers - by gone but meals,

no walking dis

Last month Mr

NIC CECIL

office admit more

30 illegal immi

we will bring in blunkett denied as a new San-

it has no beds

into Wales

ACIS

RIME

P20

I No

I IN

P25

to stage

TALIBAN No2 GIVEN

heroin mob

£250,000

OF RACIST THUG

Before the Deluge

► PART 2: John Maddox concludes his comparison of today's Britain with that which existed before post-war mass immigration and the 1960s political and social relativism destroyed homogenous Britain. Again, he uses as his source the popular novel of the 1950s, Bond Street Story by Norman Collins.

So where and how have things gone so badly wrong as we survey the ruins of our society and culture in 2008?

One seed which we can see planted in the novel is that of a corrosive cynicism about the motives, capabilities and achievements of those 'at the top' - either in business or the public bureaucracies.

It is still nascent but it is almost a default position in Bond Street Story, that those 'at the top' are vain, barely competent and posturing, and that the usual outcome of their initiatives is failure, waste and pomposity:

"It was all Mr Preece's idea that there should be any such thing as a Staff get-together.

Not that it was in any sense original. On the contrary he had first learned of the scheme in an American publication called Sales Efficiency.

... "The part that the intelligent General Manager [had] to play at a good Staff get-together [was] to listen. Listen and learn..."

... The Staff get-together led off to a pretty slow start.

The room that had been quiet before, now suddenly became silent... Mr Preece wished that he had read Sales Efficiency more carefully.

... It was Tony [Rammell] who spoke.

"Isn't it about the right time of day for a drink, Mr Preece?"

... In the hush, Mr Preece thought rapidly... if he refused, what would Mr

Tony think? Even though... he despised the young man, the last thing he wanted was for young Tony to go away with the idea that he didn't know how to organise a Staff get-together.

"Just coming, Mr Tony," he said hurriedly. "I was just about to order it."

... In the end, it was the directors' sherry that had to be sent for.

[By the end of the evening] Mr Preece was still listening hard. So far the only remark he had heard... was that Mr Prescott had apparently already missed the 6.35 and was afraid that he would miss the 7.5 as well. All things considered, it hardly seemed worth six bottles of directors' sherry to have learned that... (p. 153 ff).

This might raise a great guffaw in our current situation where we have to bear the brunt of the hugely expensive, morally bankrupt and incompetent, ideologically motivated machinations of our public services, 'guided' by our diseased political elite under orders from Brussels, which have destroyed the cohesiveness and self-belief of Britain, but such 'default' cynicism did not always exist. Think of the great Victorian pride in their ethic of disinterested public service and the mighty achievements of their public bureaucracies and local government in town planning, public health and sanitation, universal education, laying the foundations of social security, etc. A society which is not able to believe in the honest motivation and basic competence of its business and public bodies is in deep trouble.

In part, this cynicism has grown hand in hand with public realisation that for our political and ruling elites, society, as Mrs Thatcher famously told us, does not exist. There are only individual economic units which have to be organised as cogs in the vast economic machine which Britain has become. It doesn't matter whether you are Labour or Tory, socialist or conservative, our political elite is agreed that the only purpose in life is to run 'Britain plc'. The health and continuity of this economic machine is the only thing that matters. Yes, it gives great rewards to many in terms of standard of living and consumer durables, but it has consumed the indigenous British peoples, their society, their culture, their self-belief.

That is why 'socialist' government ministers can get away with justifying the mass immigration which is making prisoners of the indigenous British in their own homelands: it is 'good for the economy', therefore good for Britain, therefore good for you. The citizen now only exists as a consumer and a unit of economic production. Britons will have regained control over their destiny and self-respect when they tell their effete politicians, "If it's a trade off between an increase in standard of living or returning to a homogeneous society at ease with itself, we'll take the homogeneous society."

Life was harder, more hand to mouth, with far fewer social safety nets, in the world of Bond Street Story, but for all their travails and heartaches its characters are more settled, balanced and realistic about life, than the febrile, harassed and ideologically-hectored cultural misfits we have become today.

POLITICISATION OF THE POLICE

A crucial weapon in this turning of our intellectual and ruling elite against its own people has been the politicisation and moral corruption of our police force (and indeed of all the other agencies of social control). The police are no longer a body drawn from the ranks of a local society, living among them, visible on the streets every day, representing the customs, beliefs and standards of indigenous folk.

The police now represent an abstract system of 'values' - drawn from Marxist 'human rights' theory - which stresses equality, moral relativism and equivalence. The purpose of the police is not to represent the settled nationalities of the British Isles but to impose this abstract control system on them at the behest of the ruling elite. The police now control us; they are no longer our representatives. And, of course, in a society rapidly succumbing to the mass colonisation of unfettered immigration, the indigenous peoples have no more rights than those of the swamping incomers. The police do not represent the unwilling host community; they are even-handed between the rights of indigenous folk and the 'rights' of settlers. But since this abstract value system is controlled by our political masters with their roots in social Marxism and multicultural theory, it is inevitable that the principles which control the police in practice favour the settlers rather than the indigenous peoples. And so it has happened that the police force is now an aggressive, politicised and increasingly paramilitary force, actively attacking and dismantling the historic rights and liberties of the indigenous British people.

What a sad and demeaning contrast to the picture of the police presented in Bond Street Story! After Mr Bloot goes missing from Rammells, Mr Privett has an idea as to how to find him and visits a local police station. It is Saturday afternoon:

"The sergeant on duty asked him to wait a moment. But only for a moment. And then he took him straight in to see the Superintendent. Mr Privett was rather pleased about this. And a little fluttered. It showed that they were taking him seriously. And the superintendent was a thoroughly nice kind of man, Mr Privett discovered. Friendly. Considerate. And not a bit searching or suspicious.

"It's very good of you," he said after Mr Privett had told him his name. 'We need all the help the public can give us. It's the only way'." (p. 406).

How astonishing! A local police station open, friendly and helpful. Not hidden behind anti-Muslim-terror barriers. No security screens or intercoms to speak through. A senior officer actually willing to welcome a member of the public into his office as a fellow citizen! And not a single high-visibility yellow jacket on display, which have transformed the police into strutting, self-important Toytown noddies on the rare occasions they deign to get out of their cars!

MASS CULTURE AND MASS MEDIA

In the years of Bond Street Story, mass culture and the mass media, whilst developed, were nevertheless far less powerful. And of course, the worldwide web was unthought of. The mass media in Britain today is a coarse, dumbed-down, sex- and 'celebrity'-obsessed, morality-free, Christianity-baiting, unpatriotic, slavishly politically-correct disgrace. From The Times, BBC One and Radio Four to The Sun, Sky TV or 'independent' radio, leaden, conformist 'thinking', the morals of rats, the decorum of 'Big Brother' and Stalinist self-policing apply.

Almost universally, the mass media present a picture of British society and culture in the lowest possible denomination which, in self-fulfilling parody, is then imbibed by youngsters who 'aspire' to copy what is presented to them as 'normal'.

In his book, From Alamein to Zem Zem, an account of the Eighth Army campaign against the Afrika Corps in the Second World War, Keith Douglas tells of 'Picadilly Jim', a tank regiment commander who was killed in battle. In his will, Picadilly Jim left a sum of money to train young boys in the manly sports of hunting, shooting and fishing. Today, he would be prosecuted by our thought police for being so rebarbative, field sports having been replaced as 'appropriate' pursuits for young people by delinquency, binge-drinking and sodomy - all now promoted by our common culture.

Of course, publishing houses are also part of the mass media. And Bond Street Story itself demonstrates something remarkable, i.e. in the 1950s a respected publishing house - William Collins Ltd - was happy to call a spade a spade without the ideological roof falling in.

Mrs Rammell has a penchant for dinner parties and exotic 'artists'. She throws a party to introduce the 'Eastern' dancer, Swami Lal. It is gate-crashed by Sir Harry Rammell, patriarch of the department store, who falls in with Major Cuzzens, a guest:

"Dirty business," Sir Harry was saying. "Naturally it finished him. Couldn't show his face in the City again."

"Fellah was a dago, wasn't he?" Major Cuzzens inquired.

He spoke in a tone that made it clear that he would have regarded that as explaining, even excusing, everything.

"Oriental," Sir Harry answered... "One of those turban johnnies. Slit your throat as soon as look at you..." (pp 90-91).

Good heavens, 'racist' language openly used in a mass market novel which was purchased in its thousands and devoured by scores of thousands without a hair being turned! But they were grown up about these things before the 1960s.

The 'tone' of this scene is skittish, making it plain that Sir Harry has set out to annoy Mrs Rammell by offering unflattering remarks about her star guest. But also he speaks frankly - without animus - about how the world is and how people react to and describe one another. None of this shocked Collins' readers, the reviewers, his publishers, the police, politicians or clerics. Why should it shock us?

After all, in the London of 2008 you can go into many Muslim bookshops and find much worse language on open offer; in particular, the term 'kuffar', which Muslim apologists claim is merely a technical term denoting a non-Muslim but which is often used as a term of derogatory, dehumanising racial abuse. And you will not have to search long to find the most despicable racial pillorying of Jews, described in the more explicit of these Muslim books as animals, sub-humans, fit only for extinction.

In such a context, the teasing use of words such as 'dago' seems innocuous indeed.

George Orwell, once the darling of the left, but now under a deep cloud for his foresight in predicting the development of socialist thought control, had a wonderful term of abuse for all those internationalist, authoritarian social Marxists who are now in the ascendancy: he dismissed them as "sandal-wearing, fruit juice-drinking pansies!" Tough talking perhaps, but if free speech means anything it must include the right to annoy, offend and insult. I've lost count of the number of times I've been insulted by our left wing professional haters of Britain!

DEMOGRAPHY

Towards the end of Bond Street Story, there is a casual sentence which in fact encapsulates the crisis now facing the British people. Wondering if she might return to fulltime work at Rammells after 'Junior' is at school, Irene reflects, "...by then there might be another Junior... She and Ted had always told themselves they were going to have more than one." (p. 445). Indeed, normal families up to the 1960s would have three or more children. Then came the introduction in the 'Swinging Sixties' of mass contraception and the legalisation of abortion. The result has been a self-inflicted genocide for the British people.

Because of government-sponsored mass contraception and abortion, the number of births between the 1960s and today has fallen by a third; government-promoted abortion has now killed over six million babies in the womb. Abortion is now being used as a form of birth control and is running at over 190,000 babies killed every year. This is, quite simply, self-imposed national extinction. The birth rate per couple is now 1.94 (and that of the genuinely native population is even lower than this average figure - Ed). The British people are rapidly ageing and in a few years' time, for the first time in history, there will be more pensioners than children in the country.

And yet our population is projected to rocket to the 75 million mark by mid-century. How? Mass immigration, of course, and the much higher birth rate among the foreigners now colonising Britain. (Over half of all births in London are to first generation, i.e. recently arrived, immigrant women.)

Two hundred thousand indigenous Britons are fleeing the country every year, disgusted at what now passes for British life. So, low conception rates, record abortion numbers, mass immigration, high immigrant birth rates, record British emigration, a rapidly-ageing residual indigenous population - this is a lethal mix which will result in self-genocide within the next few generations. Are our intellectual and ruling elites worried? Of course not, for this is their ideal opportunity to gerrymander the country once and for all according to their social Marxist tenets and produce a 'new' Britain with a 'new' people (and a 'new' religion, Islam), ready to face the 'challenges' and 'opportunities' of submersion in the United States of Europe - their glamorous but fatal twenty-first century project. By the end of the century it will have transmuted into 'Eurabia'.

The characters of Bond Street Story, whether at the top or the bottom of the social pile, would have revolted instinctively against such destructive wickedness and would have resisted en masse. I am afraid all the signs are that our Marxist 'British' government is convinced that this time they have got the British people licked.

But consider: go into any supermarket in almost any major British city and you will see all sorts and conditions, all colours and creeds, but the only thing that 'unites' this kaleidoscope of people is the economic machine which they are either servicing or using. But this is so only on the premises: they come and go, largely, in their own ethnic or religious or family groups. It is only in this 'public' space that the pretence can be asserted that they are united as a community. Outside, in the streets, at home, in their community centres or religious places, separate values apply. It is nonsense to claim that any concrete, nation-building set of beliefs unites them; it is even more nonsensical to claim that a set of abstract universal values, such as those embodied in human rights theory, unites them. Like will cleave to like. And when the capitalist machine falters or breaks down, as one day it will, so will this artificial, imposed and policed 'unity' and the age-old struggle for dominance between societies, races and religions will reassert itself. But this time the battle will be fought not on foreign soil, but in Britain.

Are the British people strong enough and numerous enough to win this looming struggle? And do they have leaders with determination and vision who they are prepared to follow? We will soon find out, for on current demographic trends it is now or never. Lose and we will lose our society, history and culture, and be reduced to the status of Aborigines in Australia or Native Indians on their reservations in North America. It is as serious as that.

What a pile of thoughts to derive from a humble popular novel, now long forgotten! But if you come across a copy of Bond Street Story don't hesitate to read it. It will tell you a great deal about the people and the society which created the post-War economic surge which has given us so much, at least in terms of prosperity, comfort and opportunity. We hold their legacy in safe-keeping; don't let us surrender it to the colonising hordes, whether from East Europe, Asia or Africa, nor to our ruling elite stuck in their 1960s time warp. If we do, the ideal of a compassionate but vigorous, civilising and homogeneous society which we can hand on to our children with pride will be lost forever.

Identity Magazine

- Issue 100 & Beyond

The British National Party is in the midst of a period of very rapid growth. Our membership is at a record high, and rising by the day. This growing success brings great benefits, but it also brings fresh challenges.

Principle among these in a time of rapid growth is the urgent need to inform and educate new members. When they first join, it is inevitable that many fresh recruits are motivated by a simple, honest 'gut feeling' that the old political elite have got things horribly wrong and that it's time to do something to help to stop the rot and put things right.

Of course, that's a great start, but in itself it's not enough. The BNP is not here just to provide an outlet for good people's understandable anger at the old politicians and what they've done to our country, we are here above all to create and popularise a new vision for a better Britain - the 'Land fit for Heroes' that has so often been promised and so rarely delivered.

To do that we need to articulate and disseminate a radical traditionalist vision of a better way of ordering our society. Developing such a firm and principled ideological base is not something that can be done overnight. Ideas have to be developed, debated and spread to an ever wider proportion of our membership.

As long-standing readers will know, Identity has already been playing an important role in this process over the last ten years, in which time it has been Britain's leading and most influential nationalist magazine. But with so much potential for rapid growth, it is vital that our educational training programme moves up a gear, lest our success lead to the BNP being swamped by naïve liberal civic nationalism.

We have thought long and hard about this danger, and how to deal with it. A key conclusion is that the circulation of Identity in its present form is not high enough to be reaching a large enough proportion of the party to maximise its educational potential. A large amount of work goes into the magazine each month, but frankly we're missing what should be our core target.

In order to address this, to get maximum value for our production money and to ensure that every single new member is exposed from Day 1 to regular bursts of top quality educational material about true nationalism, Identity is therefore being expanded into a 64-page, perfect bound, quarterly magazine. This will be sent automatically to every single paid up member four times a year as part of their membership entitlement.

At a single stroke, this will increase Identity's educational and advertising reach by more than five-fold. A design revamp at the same time will take advantage of the substantial amount of extra space available to ensure that there are more light, 'easy way in' articles and features, side-by-side with a more in-depth piece of political analysis each issue. There will, in sort, be something for everyone.

Existing Identity subscribers will have a choice over what to do about the unexpired portion of their subscriptions. As a rule these will be credited on as an extra period on their party membership, with members who do not wish to take advantage of this system being given a choice of either a credit slip to be spent with Excalibur, or a refund. Non-members' subscriptions will simply be adjusted to take into account the extra cover price of the enlarge magazine and its reduced frequency. In all cases, figures will be rounded up in subscribers' favour.

The job of deciding what to put in each issue will be carried out by an editorial board, one of whose members will be John Bean, the nationalist veteran who has put so much dedicated and thoughtful work into bringing Identity to its landmark 100th issue. Another will be Mark Collett, whose excellent design work has seen Identity improve vastly over the past five years.

The first issue of the new look Identity will be produced this summer, allowing us to report in depth on June's elections, and to look ahead to the fresh set of targets that they will lead to us setting for the future.

BATTLE FOR BRITAIN

BRITISH NATIONAL PARTY

2009

I want to help my country and enclose a one off donation to help the British National Party win the Battle for Britain and to secure our future.

TITLE: ☐ Dr ☐ Rev ☐ Mr ☐ Mrs ☐ Miss ☐ Ms

FIRST NAME: LAST NAME:

HOUSE N°: STREET:

TOWN: POSTCODE:

TEL N°: DATE OF BIRTH:

I enclose my cheque for £ (payable to 'BNP' or 'British Heritage') or debit my card below

Visa ☐ Delta ☐ Maestro ☐ Mastercard ☐ Amex ☐

Card Number

Expiry Date Security Code

Issue N° if Maestro Valid From

Signature

Donation Hotline 0871 050 0234

How can just £3.00 a week help us save this country from destruction?

YOUR STANDING ORDER WOULD:

- Help us fight the P.C. fanatics and corrupt politicians who are destroying our British way of life.
- Allow us to organise more effectively and to fight many more local, regional and national elections...and WIN!
- Send a clear message to our activists, staff and supporters that you care about this country and have faith in this party.

Your £3.00 a week could pay for 10,000 quality leaflets every year! Just think, how many people your gift could influence and inspire.

Fill in and return
the form below within the next 7 days

STANDING ORDER FORM

Please complete the details on this form and return to BRITISH HERITAGE, FREEPOST. Use the envelope provided.

Below standing order form or see reverse for one off donation.

Yes I want to make a monthly gift to 'British Heritage' of £12.00 or £..... each month until further notice and debit my account number

--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--	--

Bank Sort Code

			-				-
--	--	--	---	--	--	--	---	--	--	--

Starting on

	/		/
--	---	--	---	--

Please allow at least one month between signing this form and the date of the first payment.

Signature

--

Today's date

--

To: Manager (Branch Name & Address)

--

--

--

	Postcode
--	----------	--

FOR OFFICE USE ONLY: British Heritage

--

Title: Mr/Mrs/Miss/Ms/Other

--

D.O.B

/	/
---	---	--

Full Name

--

Address

--

--

--

Postcode

--

Telephone

--

My

Email is

--

Post back to us. NOT YOUR BANK

became traditional to have a St. George's day cover for month of April, this is my favorite. The actual image of George slaying the dragon is taken from a stained glass window in a church.

The selection of covers on these pages are some of the best from the last few years. They deal with a range of topics - from white history, white slavery, electoral targets, the economy and the two court trials that myself and Nick Griffin were involved in from 2004 until 2006 - one even saw the river Thames turn to blood to echo the famous speech made by Enoch Powell. If you like what you see, please feel free to go to www.identitymagazine.org.uk to view our growing archive of past articles and artwork.

Richard Barnbrook's GLA victory in May 2008 was the inspiration behind this pop-art cover of Richard looking out over a red, white and blue London.

The BNP's exposure crisis was a running piece of artwork was catching but was also several mainstream p

Two of our popular covers were based on early computer games Tetris and Space Invaders, the latter a joke at the expense of the Home Office who had been caught using illegal immigrant workers.

Monty the Mole appeared in January 2008 and was seen throughout the magazine thwarting Searchlight's attempts to cause a split in the party.

